Prayers

"Some people may think that's not really sincere religion," Schmid said. "But something that worries me is the sameness that appears in our prayers when we do them off the cuff."

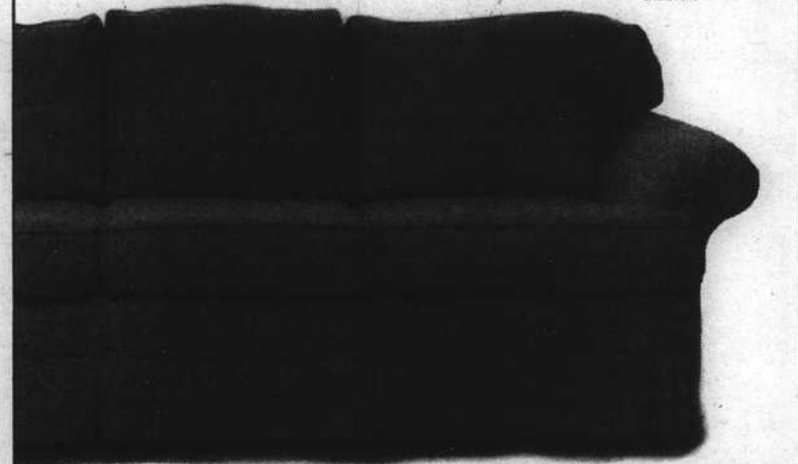

"Dawn in the Afternoon" is intended "to put you more in tune with what the will of God is," Schmid said.

"Prayer is not just talking, but it's listening as well."

Schmid gathered the prayers in this collection for more than a decade, and he rewrote them several times in an attempt to keep them fresh and alive in the face of changing situations.

The book is available from the First Presbyterian Church office, or, Schmid said, "you can come to church on Sunday and pick one up."

Get off it. Exercise.

Dunston

dren while managing a hotel full of wealthy, inconsiderate jerks.

As this discomforting family drama unfolds, the cruel owner (Faye Dunaway) of the Majestic Hotel harasses her hotel employees and a fat guest of the hotel (Glenn Shadix) constantly falls down or is hit on the head with heavy objects. Both of these painful reoccurrences are supposed to be wild family fun.

Instead, watching employees being abused by both their superiors and the hotel's customers for more than an hour proves to be excruciating for anyone with a smidgen of a social conscience.

In one of the more "tasteful" scenes, Alexander promises his children a vacation at a different hotel, so his family could "nag" new hotel employees and "make their lives miserable," too. Yippee.

Alexander's generosity peaks in a scene where Dunaway orders an employee to be removed for bumping into her. Instead of firing the maid, Alexander offers the blue-collar worker a week's paid vacation in exchange for pretending to cry in front of his tyrannical employer.

This offer, which might be understood as an act of kindness if he was working for Saddam Hussein at the Hotel Iraq, shows only the manager's cowardice and unwillingness to stand up for his workers in any situation.

Throughout this supply-side zaniness, the orangutan chirps and protrudes his lips listlessly. Occasionally he swings wildly through the hotel, down the maintenance shafts and through the windows, as though he is looking for a way out of this movie — just like the rest of us.

IN DEBT?
