Students fight possible veto

Governor's action could leave UNL $5 million short

By Kasey Kerber

ASUN and RHA have joined forces against Gov. Ben Nelson in an effort to keep student tuition from rising.

The action is aimed at Nelson's threat to veto a bill allotting $5 million to the University of Nebraska for salary increases.

The figure had been $7 million, but it was reduced to $5 million as a compromise between legislators and the governor. Even with the lowered amount, Nelson still may veto the bill.

If the bill is vetoed, which could occur early this week, the University of Nebraska, which is committed to the salary increases, would be faced with raising $5 million.

In a joint effort, the Residence Hall Association and Association of Students of the University of Nebraska recently sent out letters to every student living in the residence halls. They encouraged students to write letters to legislators and encourage their parents to join in the cause.

"The letters pretty much inform students of the current situation and ask for their help to work toward changing it," said Eric Marintzer, ASUN president.

Marintzer said he believed students knew the issue existed, but they were not fully aware of what would result from a $5 million shortfall.

James Griesen, vice chancellor for student affairs, said the consequences could be drastic.

"In prior rounds of student funding cuts, we've had to eliminate two deans and become a much flatter institution," Griesen said.

Fees expected to increase

Students concerned about Gov. Ben Nelson's potential veto of funds earmarked for university salary increases should stop by the Innocents Society booth in the Union today.

A $5 million appropriation in the state's main budget bill is under threat of being slashed by Nelson's red pen. University officials have said they are locked into the raises the money would fund.

If the measure is vetoed by Nelson, UNL students' tuition may increase to support the salary increases — as much as 5 percent or 6 percent above any other increase.

Brian Buescher of the Innocents Society said the measure would have a major impact on student tuition. He said the booth would help to increase awareness of the issue and provide a petition for students to sign.

The petition will be sent to state legislators to encourage them to override Nelson's veto, Buescher said.

State senators need a two-thirds majority to override the veto.

Most students are not as aware of the issue as they should be, he said, but a possible tuition increase was something students should be interested in.

Buescher said it was important for the Innocents to get involved in issues like these to help out the student body.

"This is an issue that directly affects students," he said. "If students were more aware of (the issue), then they would be more concerned."

The Innocents Society also will send letters to legislators.

"Our focus is on the legislators," he said.

Griesen said past funding cuts also have forced the merging of university programs and an increase in such student fees as registration and graduation fees.

If Nelson were to veto the bill, this would be the second straight year the governor has vetoed a bill allotting funds to the University of Nebraska.

Last year, Nelson's veto was overridden by the lawmakers.

"I don't think there's any evidence that education is specifically being targeted by the Legislature," Griesen said. "Yet if the governor vetoes this bill, it would probably reflect his disagreement with the budget and the legislators that have proposed it."
