Aurite to compete against the finalists from eleven other universities, he said.

He said his parents were also going to drive down to see him compete for tickets to the Olympics and a 1996 Nissan truck.

The finals, which are sponsored by Coca-Cola and Champion, will be held in a football stadium in Atlanta.

Unfortunately for Aarden, who plays center for the Nebraska Women's basketball team, athletes were not eligible to qualify for the finals, though they were allowed to compete.

"I wasn't even going to do it. We were on the way to play raquetball and we just decided to do it."

Sorensen said he had no expectations, but would wait to see what will happen.

He said he had never been to Atlanta before and was excited to go.

"I can't wait to go," he said.

Gugat's bail set at $10,000

From Staff Reports

A woman charged with felony child abuse in connection with the death of her 2-year-old son faces at least 20 years in prison if convicted.

Susie Gugat, of Lincoln, went before Lancaster County Court Judge James Foster Tuesday afternoon. Her charges were read and she was assigned counsel.

Her next court appearance will be April 29.

The 28-year-old Gugat was arrested last Friday, a week after police found her son dead in their home on the 1700 block of North 17th Street.

An autopsy report said Sean Gugat died of "multiple blunt forces injuries." The injuries were determined to be from child abuse and not accidental, the report said.

Since the release of the autopsy report, the case is being investigated as a homicide.

Foster set bail for the unwed mother at $10,000.

Survey to help UNL

Students want improvements in parking

Most UNL students are satisfied with the university, but its handling of campus parking is below par, according to a recent survey.

James Griesen, vice chancellor for student affairs, said the Omnibus Survey showed that students thought the University of Nebraska-Lincoln was doing a good job in the areas of campus safety and student services.

"I think it is a very valuable set of findings that guide us tremendously for understanding students and their expectations," Griesen said.

The survey, in its second year, is being conducted by the Bureau of Sociological Research. The results from last year's survey were released in February, Griesen said.

Cheryl Wiese, assistant director of the bureau, said 20 part-time interviewers conducted the survey.

The interviews were conducted last March and completed last April, she said.

The bureau contacted 530 UNL undergraduates by phone for the survey, Griesen said.

About 25 percent of students contacted did not want to participate.

"We had a very high response rate," Griesen said. "The response was typical for telephone surveys."

The students who participated were asked 145 questions in the categories of demographics, campus safety, social issues, satisfaction with services, satisfaction with UNL and behaviors and beliefs.

Of the students who responded, 88 percent were white. The remaining respondents were Asian, Hispanic and black.

Students were chosen for the survey using random sampling, Wiese said.

"The names were randomly generated from a list of all student names, so every student had an opportunity to be included in the sample," she said.

The computer chose students' names randomly, instead of in a pattern such as every fifth name, Wiese said.

In the survey, 63.7 percent of students think UNL is doing a good job on campus safety. Almost as many — 65.2 percent — think there is not an adequate amount of parking on campus.

One statistic that troubled Griesen was that 32 percent of students said they saw their adviser more than once a semester, and 35 percent said they saw their adviser once a semester.

"All in all, that's pretty good," Griesen said. "But I'd like to see that at 100 percent visiting their advisers. The fact that one-third of students are visiting their advisers more than once a semester looks good."

As years go by, he said, the survey results will become even more valuable.

"We'll be able to see how changes we've made are reflected in the survey," he said.

For example, Griesen said, if UNL changes parking to try to make the situation better, but the survey still reflects student dissatisfaction, the university will know that more needs to be done.

Also, he said, the survey will become important for the North Central Accreditation next semester.

"We're expected to be evaluating," Griesen said. "Assessment is a large part of the NCA visit. We have to be able to demonstrate we're surveying students and finding out their needs."
