stunned" when he heard there was no policy regarding faculty and staff with firearms.

Students now must store guns in lockers at the University Police Department.

The gun ban on campus followed an incident where a UNL student, convicted to at least 20 years in prison last January, shot a university police officer.

One of the recommendations that raised eyebrows was one that stated faculty members, coaches and advisers were not to initiate any contact with the victim of the alleged assault committed by the member of their unit.

After Phillips assaulted his former girlfriend, Head Football Coach Tom Osborne called her to try and discuss the situation.

That was not Osborne's first foray into law enforcement. When former cornerback Tyrone Williams was accused of shooting into a moving car in 1994, Osborne was reported to have had the weapon used and turned it in to police days after the incident occurred.

The recommendations also stated that the judicial board should suspend a student from participating in activities for up to a year if charged with a violation of the student code of conduct, or of any criminal offense.

A debate among faculty at UNL erupted after the Phillips incident about whether or not Phillips should be allowed to play football.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs James Griesen said in the past, the Judicial Board either booted a student out of school, or allowed them to stay with activities privileges intact.

Now, Moeser said, students can stay in school, but no longer represent the university in any area. During questioning, Moeser said that while some extenuating circumstances would be granted, status as a big-time football player would not be one of them.

The recommendations reaffirmed the judicial board's off-campus jurisdiction. The board has the power to discipline a student if they are charged with a crime that occurred off-campus.

Griesen said, however, that it was difficult for the university to track off-campus incidents.

"We can not possibly track on every conviction and offense committed," he said.
