still brought some misconceptions with him.

"We were all a little apprehensive at first, but when we got there, the feeling was all gone. It was very safe and the people were friendly," he said.

It took some time for Marintzer to adjust to the customs of a foreign country, but he said it wasn't a big problem for him, especially in the larger cities.

The whole country is very Americanized," he said. "Tel Aviv was like a suburb of New York."

Although Hebrew is the language spoken in Israel, Marintzer said Israeli children learn English from the time they are 10 until they finish secondary school, so communication wasn't a problem.

"There's so much more there than what you see in the media," he said. "You can only get a superficial glance of what's going on over there. It's much more complicated than what you hear in the U.S."

Medical miracles

Marintzer said the feeling of military presence in the country is hard to miss because armed soldiers casually walk the streets along with everyone else.

"In the U.S., we worry about taxes and the environment, and seemingly unimportant things like that, and there, they're on the brink of extinction from their neighboring countries," he said.

The students had an opportunity to meet with student leaders from Hebrew University in Jerusalem to discuss issues and exchange cultural information.

Marintzer said many Israelis had such deeply held convictions that it almost made him think the country's problems could not be resolved. But he said there was faith in Israel that peace will come to the Middle East.

"There are so many sides to the issues," Marintzer said, "but the people have so much optimism, especially the students. It was so encouraging."
