Common sense helps to stop campus crime

Bushing said crimes of opportunity usually were the result of people being too trusting.

The two campus buildings with the most thefts are the Lee and Helene Sapp Campus Recreation Center and the Nebraska Union, according to 1995 and 1996 campus police records.

Bushing said taking time to lock up items is the difference between leaving with them and having them stolen.

"You may think you are in the immediate area when ... you throw your jacket on top of your wallet, but it's still not a safe practice to do," he said. "Get it locked up where you don't have to keep an eye on it."

University police are trying to educate students — especially younger students, who are the largest victims of crime on campus — about crime prevention, Bushing said.

Starting next week, the police department and the health aides on campus will be distributing a newsletter to students in the residence halls and the greek units dealing with crime prevention and health issues, he said.

The weekly newsletter will include tips on campus escorts, domestic violence, vehicle thefts, street sense and information about Rohypnol, sometimes called "the date-rape drug," Bushing said.

Natural grub at veggie club

By KASEY KERBER

Vegetarians, potential vegetarians and even omnivores simply interested in a tasty veggie dish now have a student organization to call their own.

The Vegetarians Eating Good Grub in Nebraska Society will hold its inaugural meeting Sunday, which is World Vegetarian Day.

Currently, the society is the only student-recognized vegetarian organization at UNL.

The meeting will feature a potluck dinner, information about vegetarianism and a presentation by speaker Kay Young, author of the native plant cookbook "Wild Seasons."

The organization will hold similar meetings every other Sunday.

Carol Klein co-founded the VEGGIN Society this year with her husband, Robert Klein.

"We felt it was important for people to be eating lower on the food chain," Klein said.

Carol Klein said vegetarianism can lead to a healthy body and healthy environment. She said the potluck dinners appeal to non-vegetarians interested in good food or healthier lifestyles and isn't exclusive.

"You don't have to be a vegetarian to be a part of this," Klein said.

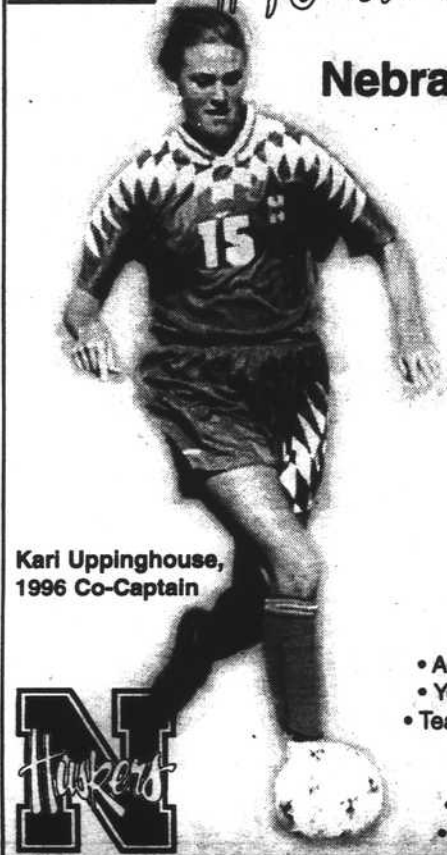

Klein said that the society had about 20 unofficial student members so far, with others expressing interest from outside the campus community.

The VEGGIN Society hopes to discuss plans for World Vegetarian Day, Earth Day and possible participation in the Nebraskan Vegetarian Society's "Vegetarian Awareness Festival."
