Discovery made under Picasso painting

ferent wavelength and hitched to a computer to enhance them, brought out more detail. They established a different bullfight scene with human figures in it, too.

Hoenigswald recognized some details as similar to a drawing, now in the Picasso Museum in Paris, of a dead horse being dragged by two others.

Even deeper were odd bits: a dog's head, the lettering of a friend's name. "These were sketches — almost doodles — rather than any specific composition," Hoenigswald said.

That was a Picasso trait, wanting to fill any empty space on a canvas, a wooden panel or a piece of paper, she said.

So in the end, three layers emerged beneath "Tragedy": the rough sketches, a thickly painted action scene from the bullring, and another bullfight painting, showing horses dragging a dead horse from the ring.

Picasso, long interested in bullfights, was showing a common scene: Before the matador engages the bull, horsemen enrage it with thrusts from a long lance. The bull gores and kills the horses, which other horses then drag from the ring.

After his friend's suicide, Picasso apparently turned the wooden panel showing that bullfight scene from horizontal to vertical and painted "Tragedy."

But though the subject was different, he still used lines that remained on the panel from the earlier pictures. The shape of one horse's head from a bullfight painting, for example, defined the line of a man's neck and shoulder in "Tragedy."
