group. Bike Peddlers and Blue's Bike and Fitness shops advocated alternative transportation to driving cars. The bike shops also sold cycling products at their booths.

Sustainable Energy for Economic Development, an organization of 21 environmental groups, gave out brochures discussing legislation it's proposing. The legislation would cause Nebraska to use more local fuel instead of buying fuel from other states.

"Events like this give the opportunity to get the message out to new people and identify the people who want to get involved," said Walt Bleich, director of Nebraska Citizen Action, one of the environmental groups in SEED.

At a nearby table, members from Ecology Now sorted out a week's worth of trash they collected to see how much could be recycled. Some students and administrators carried their trash around with them last week to determine how much was recyclable.

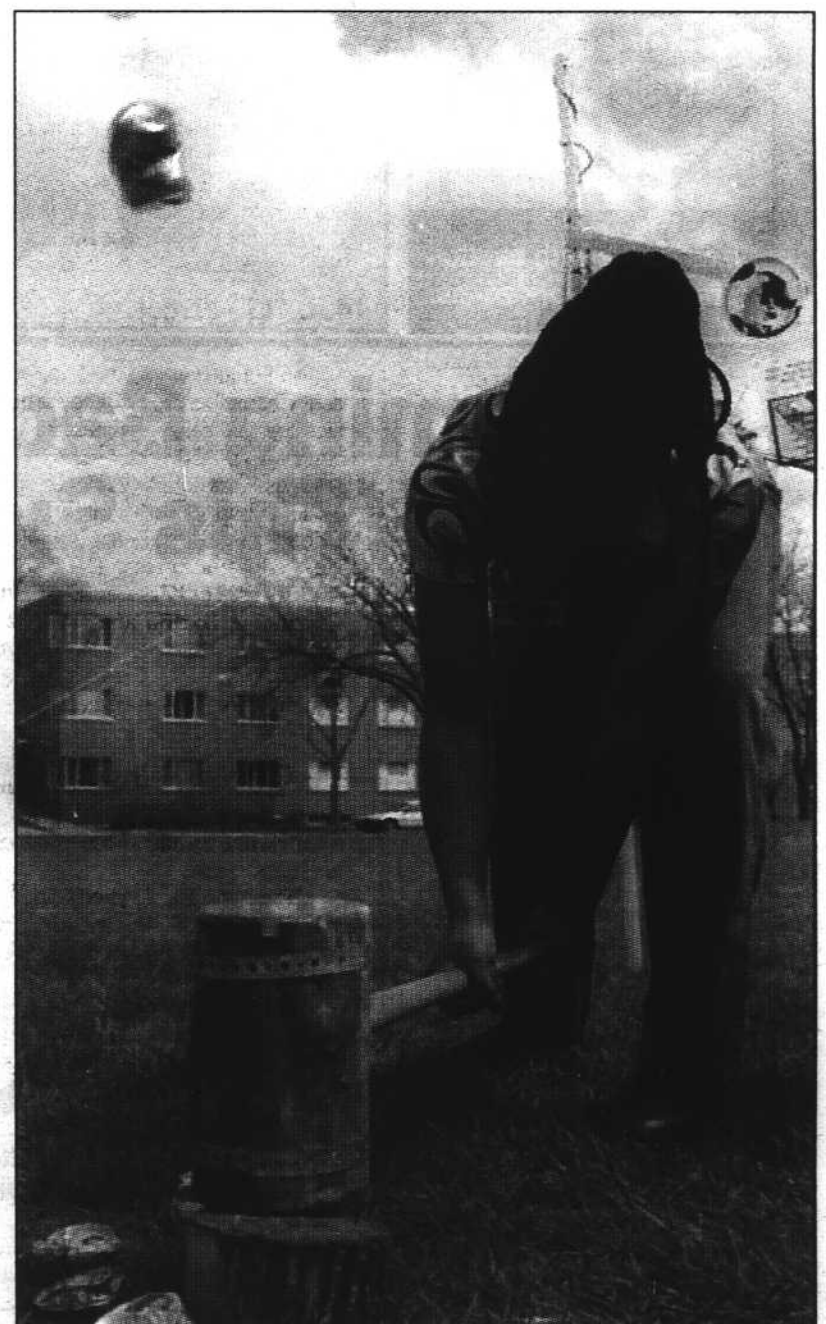

Out of 56 pounds of garbage collected, 49 pounds were recyclable. The remainder was true waste.

Ecology Now did another campus cleanup activity at Harper-Schramm-Smith residence halls, where students collected 130 pounds of trash. Fifty-five pounds of that heap were recyclable.

Dan Ulrich, recycling coordinator for Ecology Now, explained how recycling can be easy. It's just a question of people making the effort to do it, he said.

He said Lincoln has 14 recycling drop-off sites, so nearly everyone in the community has a site near his or her home.

"Recycling is all over the campus and the community," Ulrich said. "We have hardly any trash if everyone recycles."
