community to these concepts "before diversity was a popular word," said Helen Long Söldier, American Indian consultant in the Office of Multicultural Affairs.

Robbins came to the University of Nebraska at Omaha in 1970 to pursue his master's degree. In 1976, after receiving his doctorate in education and joining the UNL faculty, he quickly extended his teaching efforts well past the university's doors.

The next year, he was elected president of Lincoln's Indian Center, where he later served as chairman of the board until he resigned in 1982, when the center faced serious financial strains and staff turnover.

This fall, he continued to teach three courses as a faculty member in two university departments: the Center for Curriculum and Instruction and the Institute for Ethnic Studies.

Miguel Carranza, director of ethnic studies, said Robbins taught students not only to be sensitive, but to understand and appreciate cultural differences.

His philosophy was based on inclusiveness, and his focus on educating teachers on inclusiveness from a minority perspective often remains a missing dimension in many universities' curricula nationwide, Carranza said.

Funeral services for Robbins will be at 11 a.m. Friday in the Lutheran Student Center, 535 N. 16th St.

Other faculty members will teach the rest of his three fall courses: Introduction to Ethnic Studies, Multicultural Education and Cultural Foundations of Education.
