King breakfast benefits from telling perspective

By JONATHAN HOUGHTON

Helen Adams almost didn't speak at the Martin Luther King Jr. Freedom Breakfast Friday morning.

She wasn't sure she had a story to tell about living with racism in Lincoln during her 71 years.

But the audience of 700 disagreed and gave Adams a standing ovation.

Adams, a teacher at Elliott Elementary School, said she hoped King's dream of racial harmony would one day become a reality, despite her struggles with racism in Lincoln.

"It is possible for people to work together, stay together and make things better together," she said.

Adams' optimism remains despite two negative experiences with bigotry she said she will never forget.

Once, Adams phoned the leader of a Girl Scout troop she wanted her daughter to join. The leader invited the two to come to the meeting.

But the den mother was noticeably less enthusiastic upon meeting Adams and her daughter face to face, saying she hadn't realized on the phone that they were "darkies."

Rather than tolerate the den mother's prejudices, Adams said, she left her daughter at the scout meeting and immediately called the main Girl Scout office to report the incident.

"That was the first time I did anything close to being militant," she said.

On another occasion, Adams and her husband applied for a bank loan in order to purchase land. They were granted the loan, but only if they picked a lot in the "black" section of town.

Adams said she and her husband refused the loan, and she added that she wishes that bank employee could see her house, located close to Mayor Mike Johanns' house, today.

Although Adams said King's dream has yet to be totally realized, she also believes that laws are not the solution to racism.

"I don't think you can legislate people's hearts," she said. "I think you change people's hearts by talking with them one on one."

The Freedom Breakfast, held at the Cornhusker Hotel, also featured short speeches by Gov. Ben Nelson and Johanns.

Nelson said embracing diversity includes practicing "zero tolerance" for racism of any kind.

Adams agreed. "We are still judging people by the clothes they wear, by the color of their skin and how much money they have."

New SEA adviser Lopez inspires newfound zeal education major Dan Van Bibber. "We just took it one step further."

The newsletter is not just for SEA members, but the whole department. The group also has a new Web page.

"More communication among the members is vital for this year," Van Bibber said.

During the spring semester the SEA will work on class and style, and it will instruct members on organization and composition of classes they will teach.

Officers will attend the Spring Delegate Assembly, the business side of the organization, to elect state officers and make changes to the SEA constitution.

Last semester was Lopez's first as the SEA adviser, and he didn't even know he was going to be the adviser until this fall. Therefore, he said, he didn't want to change much of the group's structure.

"The officers were established already, and it's not up to me to change any thought or effort they put into it," he said.

Lopez got the job, he said, after the old adviser left. The dean's office phoned him and three others to ask if they wanted the job.

They must have all turned it down, and he was left, he joked. But that doesn't matter to the students. To them, he couldn't be more perfect for the job.

"Bill stepped in and was so excited for things to happen," Van Bibber said. "He'd do anything for us. ... He's been a great help to the SEA."

Freshman elementary education major Brandy Nash said most other advisers seemed too busy to deal with students outside of meetings and classes, but Lopez has worked well with the students.

"He's not too busy. He's even gone out of town with us (to November's conference in Kearney), which is kind of unusual," she said. "He has a lot of new ideas to make our club stronger."

Fifth-year senior and elementary special education major Jill Ludwig said student reaction to Lopez has been "marvelous."

"He's so full of ideas and suggestions. He's open to any ideas (we have)," she said.

The SEA will continue to grow, said Lopez. "There will be more volunteer weeks, more involvement with the New Student Enrollment."

"We're planning on a bigger campus presence."
