simply gay issues," Wolf said. He said he hopes people who attend the play won't get sidetracked with the subject matter of the play, but will instead understand what Crowley set out to get across.

"I think that the purpose wasn't to shock, it was to be honest," Wolf said. "It was to be honest about real people's lives."

He said he thinks Lincoln audiences will see that.

"I think the acting will be very professional and I'm hoping that the power of the drama itself will allow people to transcend what they may think are simple matters," Wolf said.

He said Crowley's "Boys in the Band" was first done in New York in 1968, where it gained a lot of attention. However, there was a revival of come to see it simply because it is a interest in the play in 1996 that has put Crowley in the spotlight again.

Now Crowley's work has become the standard for plays that deal with gay issues

"('Boys in the Band') really opened the door to gay theater," Wolf Unclear" opens tonight at the Wagon said. "Now every time a new gay play opens, there tends to be a recollection of the history of plays that deal with openly gay characters, and that history means they have to look back at for students.
