Lincoln band to bang out interpretive tribute show

By JASON HARDY
Senior Reporter

The local band HOWLOOSEANATION consists of four people: an aerial photographer, an eye surgeon, an anthropologist and a Bohemian.

Think that's weird? The band's instruments include outdated electronic musical mechanisms, like theremins and Moogs, as well as things like oil cans, plastic tubing and a coffee can here and there.

Tonight HOWLOOSEANATION will perform the music of Weldon Kees at the Sheldon Memorial Art Gallery, 12th and R streets.

Mark Baldrige, frontman for the group, said tonight's performance would be a combination of Kees' music and HOWLOOSEANATION's own musical creations.

"Some of it we've taken his lyrics and set them to music of our own and others we're doing straight," Baldrige said.

He said the group wasn't familiar with Kees' work before taking on this project, so adapting it into a musical performance was challenging.

"It's been a challenge, but I think we've got a lot out of it," Baldrige said. "We've grown as musicians and we've kind of picked up musical forms from this that we wouldn't have had."

He said that although they would be playing another person's material, HOWLOOSEANATION's input would be obvious.

"There will always be an element of chaos and randomness to our performances because that's what we really like," Baldrige said.

Ed Rumbaugh, percussionist for the band, said the performance would be a stripped-down representation of Kees' work, while still staying true to his original intent.

"We're going to present his music in an almost naive way," Rumbaugh said. "We've taken the music and minimized it."

"We're interested in the spontaneity that happens when you get a bunch of people together, and that's what we feel Weldon Kees was all about. I think the essence of Weldon Kees will come through."

The performance at the Sheldon is free and will start around 5 tonight.
