

Woman attacked, sexually assaulted

By JOSH FUNK
Senior Reporter

A University of Nebraska-Lincoln sophomore was sexually assaulted as she walked back to her residence hall early Saturday morning.

The 20-year-old sophomore was walking north on 16th Street, between Vine and Y streets, after 3 a.m. A man she did not know grabbed her and threw her down, UNL Police Sgt. Mylo Bushing said.

They were on the west side of the street near the sports fields when the man attacked her.

She struggled against him, kicking and scratching, as he fondled her and tried to unbutton her shirt, Bushing said.

She told police she could not scream because he had his hand around her throat, Bushing said.

Through struggling and fighting, she scared him away before he could remove any of her clothes, Bushing said, and she was uninjured in the attack.

The woman went to Schramm Residence Hall, where she called police around 4:20 a.m.

She described her attacker as a white male wearing a red and white flannel shirt and light blue jeans.

Police hope to put together a composite sketch with a more complete description later this week.

The incident is classified as a third-degree sexual assault. The assault would be a class one misdemeanor, because the attacker used force and there was sexual contact, but he did not cause serious injury or totally remove her clothes.

the opportunities she needed to advance her career as an artist.

UNL allows her the freedom to explore within her work, and she doesn't have to worry about what among her artwork would sell on the art market.

Also, the university has encouraged her to make her discoveries known through professional exhibitions, she said. The exhibitions generate responses from other professionals, critics and artists that force her to evaluate her work.

Finally, the university offers her the chance to teach and interact with students along with working with other creative professors.

When working with students, Kunc said she tries to deliver a "sense of how to search for images and ideas, and instilling confidence in their process."

She knows UNL students need this confidence and encouragement; she was an art student here, too, and graduated in the class of 1975.

"She's the main reason I came to UNL to study," said Nancy Steele, a graduate student in print making who came to UNL from Ball State University in Muncie, Ind.

Through her national and international involvement in print making, Kunc keeps up-to-date with the latest trends in the art form, as well as traditional methods, Steele said.

Kunc's sharing of her innovative style and knowledge gave Steele new freedom in her own artwork.

"It opened up a lot of doors," Steele said. "She has helped tremendously."
