

Globetrotters hold youth camp in Omaha

And in some of these towns, the conditions are less than perfect.

"There was a high school in upstate New York where you could tell they put a basketball court right on top of a hockey rink," Blair said. "It was maybe about 30 degrees in there, and here we are freezing in our shorts."

"The ball wouldn't dribble. It was doing crazy tricks."

Which brings up the what the Globetrotters are best known for: tricks. Blair said there's plenty of tricks for each player to try, and not all of them always work.

And then there's the fans. During the interview, one man walked up to Blair and put his arm around him.

"Know what I can do?" the man asked. "Balance a ball on my nose. Wanna see it?"

Blair just smiles, and laugh a little.

"He can, you know," his friend said. "Can you?"

Finally, after mugging for a camera that doesn't exist, they walk away.

"We get a lot of that," Blair said. "A lot of it is sarcastic, but we're not here for them."

They are here for the children, which Blair said was a group many professional athletes had forgotten about.

Blair lists the negative sports images of Latrell Sprewell and Mike Tyson as battles the Globetrotters are trying to fight.

"We're not getting in brawls, and we're not going out and choking the coaches," Blair said. "We're about what I think sports should be: fun."

"When I started this, I didn't have any expectations, except to decisions about the them.

"I thought the results of testing were very good," Solich said. "Overall, it is a class that runs well and is very athletic, just by watching them test and practice this afternoon. It is a good class athletically, but we need to see them perform on the field to see if there are players that can help us."

NOTES

Offensive lineman Matt Shook pulled his hamstring and sat out practice Tuesday and Wednesday.

Running back DeAntae Grixby will have his shoulder scoped and may not enroll until the winter semester.
