

Chan, Tucker join force in fun for 'Rush Hour'

back in Hong Kong. As fate would have it, the consul is best friends with Lee, and he promptly sends for him to rescue his daughter.

The conflict arises when the FBI refuses to allow Lee to work on the case. Carter is given the assignment of showing Lee the town and keeping him away from the investigation at all costs.

The tension between the two starts on cue and lasts until they decide it's better to work together and crack the case — much to the chagrin of the FBI.

Compared to Chan's previous films released in the States, "Rush Hour," his first role in an American film in more than 12 years, is quite different.

Instead of asking audiences to believe that, oh, North Vancouver is the Bronx, a la Chan's "Rumble in the Bronx," this film actually is set on location in Los Angeles. And, although the action scenes are plentiful, there are fewer in this film because time is used to develop the plot and characters.

The importance of establishing the story forces Chan to trade some martial arts sequences for extended periods of dialogue and sharing screen time with Tucker. But don't worry, the fight scenes are vintage Jackie.

Like Chan playing a cop, Tucker's role wasn't much of a stretch.

Imagine a crime-fighting version of his role as Smokey in "Friday." From start to finish, Tucker spews a nonstop barrage of one-liners with the ferocity of Chan's kicks.

Together, their respective talents provide a nice balance of comedy and action and their on-screen chemistry makes the film worthwhile. In several scenes, it's clearly apparent that they truly enjoyed working together.

For Jackie Chan purists — the same type of people who liked Quentin Tarantino before his "Pulp Fiction" days — "Rush Hour" may be a disappointment.

The lack of nonstop action may cause them to cry foul, but in return they'll receive a package that showcases Chan's acting skills and comic relief that doesn't manifest itself from poorly overdubbed English.
