Students, if you're having difficulty with a faith question, ask your dormitory desk worker for a copy of the ACReW handbook; it contains the addresses and numbers of many campus ministers who will do their best to listen to your questions and answer them honestly and faithfully. Don't be turned away because of the insults and propaganda spouted by these "preachers"; they don't represent all of those who believe in God. ACReW ministers care about you and want to help with whatever struggles you're going through, be it lack of faith, personal struggles, even problems with classes. Unlike Brother Jed and his friends, who will scream for a day or two and move on, we're here yearround to work with you and for you in any way that we can.

Science before emotion

I applaud Graham Evan Johnson's column in Wednesday's DN regarding taking personal responsibility for the environment. We do need to think globally and act locally. However, we as a nation must establish global policy based on scientific research.

First, while the theory of global warming by the "greenhouse effect" is considered central dogma within most environmentalist circles, opinion in the scientific community is not near a consensus. Geophysical historical data (studies of tree rings, ice cores and ocean sediment cores), consistent surface-based temperature records and actual atmospheric concentrations of greenhouse gases have failed to support even the most conservative predictions for atmospheric change. Carbon dioxide increasingly is being captured by plants leading to a greener planet. (See The Science & Environmental Policy Project at http://www.sepp.org for more information.) This issue and others like it require objective analysis before we try to change the world.

Second, while it is unfortunate that the United States wastes a great deal of its vast natural resources and energy, we should keep this in the proper perspective. The U.S. has a remarkable ability to acquire, process and distribute resources because of the relative freedom that we enjoy as a nation. The redistribution of resources throughout the world is not a problem because of American gluttony (although I do not deny that such a problem exists). Resource scarcity is largely due to corrupt, totalitarian regimes, inefficient practices and a want for education. Although our country still has many lessons to learn itself, we have an ethical global responsibility to support democracy and educate those that have not managed their resources well. I support action to protect the environment, conserve biological diversity and pursue renewable resources. However, I feel that environmentalism suffers as a whole when politics mixes with pseudoscience and when the discussion becomes more important than the substance. We must give credence to the cause by basing our beliefs on analysis, not speculation - on science, not politics.

Let's hear it for the band

I am writing in response to Mr. Gaskins' article about the Cornhusker Marching Band. Mr. Gaskins seems to think that the band is here solely for the entertainment of the students. That is a major misconception. The Cornhusker Marching Band is the Pride of ALL Nebraska, not just the students. However, I do realize that not enough effort has been made to play to all the stadiums during the halftime performance. On a field surrounded by 76,000 people, it is difficult to write drill so that everyone gets an equal chance at hearing the band. A greater emphasis has been made this season on keeping the audience in the stands for the halftime show; however, it is a little disheartening to get out on the turf and see that half of the audience, let alone the student section, has stood up to go to the bathroom or the concession stands!

Mr. Gaskins also seems to have a problem with the music we play. There have only been TWO home games. We, like the football team, need time to find our groove. We have many shows planned in the future that the students will like. Just because we don't play "Take Me Out to the Ball Game" and other pop tunes like the Cal band did does not make us any less of a quality band. Maybe Mr. Gaskins just needs to retake his Music Appreciation class. Whatever the reason, the Cornhusker Marching Band has a strong commitment to quality halftime shows and will continue to strive for the highest. If Mr. Gaskins wants the "red carpet treatment" at the games, then maybe he should prove it by cheering and supporting the band at pre-game and halftime instead of complaining.
