

New Manson album offers good snooze

lems. Apparently a young lady just used him for sex until someone better came along and then she hit the road. Poor spaceman.

After listening to the entire album the coma pill I saw when I first opened the album seemed surprisingly appealing. Appropriately enough the album ends with a song called "Coma White," which, like the album opener, is another Bowie-esque moody space ride. The song drags throughout its entire five minutes and is little more than a boring exercise in lyrical-loneliness.

Overall, the 14 tracks on the album are repetitive and, for the most part, unoriginal. While most of the songs combine a number of melodic sound effects and other musical elements, the same elements keep popping up in every track. The same high-pitched synthesized piano sound that ends Nine Inch Nails' "Closer" is repeatedly sprinkled throughout the album and becomes very cliché after struggling to stay attentive for the hour-long duration of the disk.

The end result is a boring attempt by Manson to adapt his style to better suit the same star-crazed society he so detests. The musical aspect of the album seem intense and complex but are really just an overuse and abuse of the same sounds and structures. For the most part, the lyrics are the same as on previous Manson works, though sung with a different spaceman flair.

Overall "Mechanical Animals" is, as his song "New Model No. 15" suggests, "Pitifully predictable."

Poor spaceman.
