Free concert to showcase talents of NU faculty

The School of Music at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln will give a free presentation of classic spirituals performed by faculty artist Daryl White.

The free concert begins at 8 p.m. Thursday at Kimball Recital Hall.

White will play the trumpet with the help of Grammy-award winning gospel musician and friend Eddie Howard, Jr.

Howard currently works as musical director for the group The Clark Sisters.

White, an assistant professor of trumpet at UNL, is dedicating the performance to his parents.

"This concert will contain some of the music from the first days of my musical life," White said in a press release statement.

White plans to perform an array of gospel selections including many spiritual standards such as "Amazing Grace," "Jesus Loves Me" and "Precious Lord."

The trumpeter has a grocery list of academic-based, musical credentials. For example, White has been a clinician and soloist for the Mile High Jazz Festival for the past four years.

which in some way or another, has been the soundtrack of our lives. In it, the feet, the mind and the heart are all engaged."

To capture the objects of their affection, the photographers in this exhibit rely mainly on black and white photography.

"I think a lot of color photography falls on its face," Hinely said. "It relies so much on the color that when you take it apart compositionally, the geometry is not there."

Black and white film forces the photographer to think about the composition. It provides discipline, McGehee said.

"Just by getting down to more basic considerations, it's easier to find the grace that is there," Hinely said.

McGehee also said black and white photography capitalizes on a split in reality.

"There is something undeniably real about a photo. However, the black and white removes it one step away from the world and gives it an element of abstraction," McGehee said.

This abstraction accents the intensity and romance inherent in jazz.

While the photographers take pictures of the musicians whom they respect, most take pictures of musicians who are close, lifelong buddies.

"We're not only taking pictures of our heroes. We're taking pictures of our friends - people we get Christmas cards from," Hinely said.

The exhibit itself is the result of a longtime friendship between McGehee and Hinely.

Ever since the two attended undergraduate school together at Washington and Lee in Virginia, Hinely has inspired McGehee as an artist. Last year, McGehee knew he wanted to do an exhibit of Hinely's work.

He asked Hinely, "If you could exhibit your work with any 10 jazz photographers, who would they be?"

Hinely made a list of 11 artists, from Berlin to Berkeley, Calif. Then, he and McGehee started making calls. Ten of the artists accepted.

A few weeks ago, the packages carrying the photographs started to arrive at McGehee's house. When he opened them, McGehee said, "It was like Christmas 11 times."

McGehee said it was thrilling to see actual prints of photographs he'd seen on album covers, in magazines and on postage stamps.

"Some of this is like holding history in your hands," he said.

is pretty disconnected from the financial aspect. Orson Welles was Orson Welles no matter how much money he had to put into a film."

And it is the search for a new Orson Welles that is one of the main reasons behind this contest, Hall said.

"There's a lot of talent out there that either can't make it into the Hollywood system or hasn't bothered trying," he said. "We hope we can find some of these people and give them exposure they otherwise couldn't get."

Contest entries can be shot on film or video, but should be submitted on VHS videotape. Entry fees are $35 per feature and $25 per short. The deadline for submission is Aug. 1.
