

Matrix fails to meet potential as serious film

newcomer from Australia, does well in the obligatory female role, which means she looks good in leather pants and sunglasses. It's a shame, really, because Trinity's character shows some depth.

Coming off directing a film that had a watertight script in "Bound," the Wachowski brothers unquestionably have talent. As this is their first foray into the world of high budget (and their first encounter with money-first, art-later producer Joel Silver), it's the obvious place to go for action instead of mood. It attracts people to the theater and shows off some fine techniques for future action films to steal.

But "The Matrix" could have been something much more: much like "Dark City" was, and or even (and yes, I realize I'm pushing a little bit here) the unforgettable "Metropolis." And it is possible to meld the two genres into a film that titillates our imagination and still get action buffs off.

It's Webtastic.
