Program celebrates past, future

"We started the second or third week of school with auditions," she said. "We rehearse every day except Thursday and Saturday."

She said most dance concerts have been held in the spring, so it has been hard work trying to prepare in just one semester. The Thanksgiving break added to the difficulty.

"It was hard to get here today," she said. "It was hard to get the stamina back. Hopefully, we'll be ready by Friday."

The dance department is working closely with the theater department to put the concert together. An advanced lighting class taught by William Kenyon, a lighting and sound design professor, is handling the lighting for the concert. Brad Buffum, production stage manager for the show, is overseeing two student stage managers from the theater department and coordinating all resources between the two departments.

"It's a good opportunity to be involved with a different kind of show other than straight theater," Buffum said.

He said the challenge to put together a dance concert was much greater than overseeing a dramatic play.

"With no words to follow along, it's a challenge to see the pieces through a choreographer's eyes or a lighting designer's eyes," he said.

The concert may be a challenge to put together, but the choreographers say it's a challenge everyone is ready for.

"There's great variety in the program," Holcombe said. "There are wonderful guest artists, the students are so strong and so focused, and it's been wonderful collaborating with (the theater department)."
