UNMC research uses murdered children

Officials at the University's No Morality Center announced yesterday that since 1993 they have conducted research using tissue from children who are murdered by their parents.

The UNMC officials told the Daily Halfasskan that the research, designed to pursue a cure for leprosy, uses tissue from children up to age 6. Although children who die of natural causes also may be used, victims of abuse work better because they have bruised tissue, the officials said.

“Frankly, the research is more effective if the kids have been roughed up a bit,” said Dr. Howard Goebelman, a UNMC researcher. Officials said the corpses are donated to Dr. Larry Cutthroat, a pediatrician, by the parents accused of murder. Cutthroat, a UNMC faculty member, then allows the corpses to be used in research.

“Who else would we get them from?” Goebelman said.

The revelation of the UNMC research was met with outrage by groups working to end child abuse. Several members of the Legislature said they would support legislation banning the use of murdered children in research.

But Dr. Samuel Cohentropp, director of the UNMC research, urged citizens not to rush to judgment.

Cohentropp said UNMC would search for alternative sources of tissue to quell the controversy. Until then, he said, citizens should deal with it.

“First of all, this research in no way encourages child abuse or the murder of one's children,” he said. “No parent is going to kill their kid just so it can be used in research.”

“Secondly, let's be realistic,” Cohentropp said. “If we don't use these kids in research, they're just going to end up 6 feet under. It just University Police and administrators remain baffled by a recent series of brutal squirrel attacks that have many students afraid to walk to class.

Over the past three weeks, 72 percent of the University Health Center's patients have been squirrel attack victims.

Zoology expert and UNL biology professor Brent Nickol said the attacks may be part of the regionalist struggle between competing rabbit and squirrel populations to establish dominance on campus.

Administrators fear the attacks may cause plummeting morale as well as leaving nasty bite marks and potential rabies infections.

University of Nebraska-Lincoln Chancellor James Moeser said he was surprised but emphasized that students should try to understand the concerns of other campus groups, even squirrels.

“I would not have surmised that these cute, furry guys were so militant,” Moeser said. “but we need to consider everyone's feelings.”

University Police Sgt. Mylo Bushing said that the squirrels have organized a militant union called Squirrels On the Loose. The group is led by a squirrel named Ricky, who ran an unsuccessful write-in campaign for ASUN president last spring.

Some squirrels have been seen demonstrating on campus with signs, but they seem to rely on guerrilla warfare to make their agenda heard.

“We had a whole platoon of them cornered last week, but then the squirrely bastards disappeared into the trees,” Bushing said.

The squirrels attack both the mental and physical health of students with a trance-inducing stare before pouncing.

As passersby notice the “adorable little fur balls” munching on an acorn, the squirrel uses a hypnotic stare followed by a rhythmic patting of the tail to put the naive victim in a trance.

Then, in what appears to be an orchestrated attack, scores of other squirrels leap from the nearby bushes and begin gnawing at the unwary student's toes while others poop on the student's hair from fortified positions in the trees above.

Ayca Ariyuruk, an international affairs and political science student believes this is the most likely explanation after seeing a cunningly disguised squirrel posing as a student in her European Political Processes class.

“At first, I'll have to admit, I was a bit fooled by the little guy,”

Honors program procures prostitutes

From staff reports

The University of Nebraska-Lincoln and J-Love Bitches Brigade have signed an agreement that may propel UNL into academia's top-tier status.

Men in the UNL Honors Program, along with the suite-style rooms and financial assistance, will now have access to dirty whores just asking for it, Chancellor James Moeser announced Thursday.

“We see this as the most direct route to competing with the Ivy League,” Moeser said. “We have the one thing that no one else can offer.”

Moeser said his staff came up with idea when pouring over the dismal Honors Program dropout numbers. Too many young men were sexually frustrated, Moeser said, and spent far too much time on the Internet and watching Cinemax for pornography to masturbate with.

“We decided there was too much pressure there,” Moeser said. “and today's porn just isn't living up to our boys' creative demands. So if the boys want a quickie, they can get that, and get back to work. It's also a hell of an incentive to stay in the program.”

Young women, Moeser said, weren't the focus of the agenda. Half of them were “as frigid as the North Pole” Moeser said, the other half were lesbians.

“I don't know what we're gonna do about the girls,” Moeser said. “Especially the lesbians.”

There will be four whores to a floor, Moeser said, on call 24 hours a day. And because bitches don't need no lovin' anyway, the whores all will live in the same room.

“That's how they like it,” said Reggie Razeek Tal-Ij Raman, otherwise known as “J-Love”, pimp of the Brigade. “Bitches is as bitches does.”

Raman sees the agreement as a major opportunity to diversify business in the Lincoln area, he said. Already, plans are in the works to buy a new Gran Torino, this one without white-wall tires. Raman also said he's developing a logo, which had three Rs and a woman's breast right in middle.

“We see this as us getting respect,” he said, “which, you know, we gots now. But this is, you know, high class and shit.”

High class could describe a ticket to the Honors Program, which is gaining raves around the country for its originality. UNL already has received transfer requests from the finest schools.

“Sex sells,” Moeser said.

Originally, the plan was met with some resistance, as Lincoln has a city ordinance against sexual touching in strip bars.

“Well, that's strippers,” Moeser said. “We're talk-
