Football Coach Herman Boone, played by Denzel Washington, grills a player during football practice, chanting "Fourth quarter, fourth quarter." "Remember the Titans" is a movie about the 1971 integration of a high school football team.

'Titans' forgets its own history speech is a sound bite. Washington's persona exudes the notion he's one step ahead. It works against him here.

The player cast is littered with actors far older than high school age, which shows, especially in Bertier (Ryan Hurst), the spirited defensive captain, who meets tragedy midway through the film. There, running back-turned-linebacker Petey (Donald Faison) and beach-boy quarterback Sunshine (Kip Pardue) produce "Titans" one strange turn of events.

To keep the kids plugged into the film is Yoast's 9-year-old daughter, Cheryl (Hayden Pantierre), who watches game film and tosses tantrums when the tight end purposely whiffs on a block. Her performance is appropriately precocious, as it falls in line with the rest of the film.

And maybe the safe bet that "Titans" hedges on is its most disappointing attribute. It turns the strength of a true story — a story of boiling, painful emotions bubbling to the surface right on the football field — into a feel-good fairy tale.

A positive message? No problem. But to drench it in a story that simply changes every Alexandrian heart discounts the actual struggle of racial integration. It's a year 2000 view of a 1971 racial problem, out of touch with just about everything that raged at the moment. Howard's script is a true story, sure. But not the whole one.

And just how do we know that? Pay close attention to the way that none of the high school seniors — or anyone for that matter — never mention the Vietnam War, even though Alexandria is a Naval town. "Remember The Titans?" Not particularly well, apparently.

Hunsicker excels in business, sports, design

Despite the heavy emphasis on the business side of clothing design, Hunsicker said creativity is still a big part of merchandising.

"Not only do you have to keep up on the trends," she said, "but you also have to be able to present something in an original way."

The merchandiser, Hunsicker said, sets the mood for the product.

"It's endless the things you can do to set a mood," she said. "When you're selling an idea, the trick is to know your audience and create a mood they understand."

"It won't do any good to take, say, a product aimed at teenagers and create something that would probably only appeal to someone older," she said.

Hunsicker also spends her time as treasurer of Montage, a textile, clothing and design club. Montage will hold a clothing exhibition at the Nebraska Union in January.

Besides being a stand-out student, Hunsicker has had to balance a school schedule with the demands of being a Division I athlete.

"You get used to it," she said. "I've had years and years of practice at being a student athlete. The only thing you can do is schedule things around practice."

Wendy Wiess, an associate professor in textile, clothing and design was also impressed with Hunsicker's devotion to her school work while she was on the swim team.

"She was very focused on her projects and didn't let sports interfere," Wiess said.

Hunsicker is a "complete" student, Wiess said.

"I'm always happy when a merchandising student can do well in the design side of the college," she said.

Hunsicker said she had no trouble focusing on school while being an athlete.

"When I'm busy, I find that I'm more focused and stay on task better," she said. "When all of my time is accounted for, it doesn't give me a chance to slack off."

"Also, the biggest reason I came to Nebraska was the incomparable support this university gives its student-athletes."

Hunsicker's involvement in sports also helped her understand the team concept that is essential in the textile industry.

"This industry moves so fast that there is no way someone could do everything," she said.

Weiss agreed, and said that having a student like Hunsicker, who is familiar with team concepts, can make a group run smoothly.

Hunsicker used up her sports eligibility last year and said she went through a sort of "time shock" when the school year started.

"I had all of this time and nothing to do with it," she said.

Hunsicker has used that time to focus more on her studies and still helps with the swim team when she can.

She also worked as an intern for Von Maur last summer and said the practical experience was helpful.

"I was glad to see how the retail end of merchandising works," she said. "I can do all the class work I want, but without experience, it doesn't do me a lot of good."

Scott McClurg/DN

Hunsicker focuses on the whole picture of how design and textiles work into merchandising.

Although the experience was nice, Hunsicker said the lack of creative input in her position was a bit frustrating.

"Von Maur is very specific on where they want displays and how they want them to look," she said.

But the job did teach her how to be a true professional, and, despite the fun she had swimming for NU, Hunsicker said she is ready to move on and focus on the professional side of life.

"It's kind of funny," Hunsicker said. "I spent four years as an athlete at one of the biggest sports schools in the nation, and it takes my major to get an article written about me."
