

'Requiem' packs punch in final virtuoso sequences

performance that makes it the very best this year, places her character directly in the line of fire. Her refrigerator has begun to taunt her in hallucinatory panics. The pills mix and increase. Sara's tightly managed TV dream begins to unravel. So do the lives of Harry, Marion and Tyrone.

They take more risks, more pills, more pot, more heroin. They travel the first part of degradation just slowly enough not to notice it. But soon, the final plummet begins for all four characters.

The principal catalysts - an emaciated arm, an offer Marion's junkie habit can't refuse, two separate visits to the hospital, Sara's confrontation with the television company - play out in a can't watch/can't look away human disaster. This pot has been boiling from the opening credits, a type of dissolution, and when the funeral begins, it doesn't end until it's hammered home while the Kronos Quartet rattles its strings in the background music.

Aronofsky's final movement is punishing - and the most brilliant 15 minutes of film this year, heightened by his relative restraint over the first half of the film. "Requiem for a Dream" is beautifully shot in Coney Island, where the broken down coasters and bleached sky stand as mangled monuments to the sad universe these characters inhabit.

While more than 100 digital effects were used for the film (tiny vacuums, for example, were employed to achieve close-up drug use) he understands how to let a scene live and breathe on its own, while still incorporating fine performances.

The movie was released unrated after the MPAA slapped it with an NC-17 rating, which can only be, I'd guess, for the severity of those final sequences. This movie is not for the squeamish.

And yet, unlike films that are gratuitous, "Requiem for a Dream" drowns those expectations away with its depiction of drug use, and then simply presents absolute terror. Such a descent does exist. Here it is, in harrowing detail, masterfully done.

"Requiem for a Dream" Starring Ellen Burstyn, Jared Leto, Jennifer Connelly and Marlon Wayans. Directed by Darren Aronofsky. Written by Darren Aronofsky and Herbert Selby, Jr. Unrated (graphic sexual and drug content, language, violence) Playing at the Mary Riempa Ross Film Theater.
