Regents strive to improve recruitment

BY JILL ZEMAN

KEARNEY — After facing criticism that Nebraska's best and brightest choose to go elsewhere, the NU Board of Regents Saturday passed an aggressive recruiting plan aimed at luring the state's top students to UNL, UNO and UNK.

The board approved the campuses' plans to ratchet up in- and out-of-state recruitment, which would cost a total of $5.2 million.

The university's plan entails purchasing, for the first time ever, the names of high school sophomores who take the ACT practice test.

Those names encompass more than 70 percent of Nebraska's high school sophomores and will allow the university to directly mail information to those prospective students.

This encompasses one major goal of the plan: to contact students earlier in their high school careers.

The regents added an amendment to the resolution that said NU President Dennis Smith must approve any extra funding the schools would receive for recruitment.

University of Nebraska-Lincoln Interim Chancellor Harvey Perlman said he hoped to raise UNL's enrollment from its current 22,300 students to 25,000 by 2005, a 12 percent increase.

Perlman's plan includes a boost in the recruiting budget of about 45 percent to

Regents

$3.1 million.

To help boost enrollment, Perlman said UNL needed to focus on Nebraska residents, minorities and high ability out-of-state students.

Regent Drew Miller of Papillion said the university needed to focus on bringing more of Nebraska's students to NU before it started worrying about out-of-state students.

Perlman disagreed, and said it would be impossible to bring all of Nebraska's eligible students to the university.

"There's going to be a certain percentage (of Nebraska's prospective students) that no matter what, they'll want to get out of here," Perlman said.

Besides, Perlman said, out-of-state students bring in much-needed revenue to the university with their higher tuition rates.

Joel Schafer, UNL student body president and student regent, said out-of-state students were crucial to UNL's campus climate.

"I can't stress enough how important out-of-state students are to UNL," he said.

University of Nebraska at Kearney Chancellor Gladys Styles Johnston said to boost UNK's enrollment, prospective students needed to be contacted early in their high school career about the possibilities at UNK.

UNK aims to have 7,500 students by 2005, compared to its current 6,500. It proposes to increase its recruiting budget by $897,000.

More scholarships — especially those for out-of-state students, minorities and students with high academic ability — are essential, Johnston said.

Miller said he thought the specific targeting of minority students could drag down average standardized test scores for the university.

Lower test scores could lower NU's national ranking and reputation, which would hurt recruitment even more, he said.

Student lobbies to save Artic

BY GEORGE GREEN

Sen. Ben Nelson gets the hot seat again this week. Nelson, a moderate Democrat, has been the focal point of conservative lobbying since taking office in January.

With the senate half Republican and half Democrat, Nelson's swing vote might be key to passing several GOP initiatives, including President Bush's hefty $1.6 trillion tax cut.

But this weekend, John Seward, a UNL junior environmental studies major, aims to turn Nelson away from the Republican tide.

Seward traveled to Washington, D.C. on Friday as Nebraska's delegate to the Sierra Student Coalition's third annual national summit.

The group is the student arm of the Sierra Club, a pillar of the environmental movement that has championed preservation and conservation issues for several decades.

This year, the student group charged Seward with lobbying Nebraska's senators and representatives to reject Bush's plan to drill for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska.

The group also plans to lobby for the Red Rock Wilderness Act, which would protect 9.1 million acres of federal land in Utah.

The Arctic, though, is the group's main focus, Seward said.

The drilling proposal is a contentious issue on Capitol Hill that has resurrected old partisan battles.

Seward said he was determined to pull Nelson back to the democratic side, which opposed the plan.

"The intrinsic value of the refuge is more important than its economic worth," Seward said.

ASUN election swayed by traditional voters

BY JILL CONNER

Although this year's ASUN candidates promised to reach more nontraditional voters, traditional voters may still have decided the results.

ASUN Electoral Commission Chairman John D. Conley said although voter turnout was lower than last year, the demographics of the voters were still the same — mainly members of fraternities and sororities.

"While you need to go out and try to bring in new voters, you also need to remember the traditional voters are the ones who come out time and time again, so you need to keep them in mind when you're campaigning," he said.

ASUN President Joel Schafer said he expected a runoff between the two parties who targeted traditional voters — Score! and No Bull.

But Schafer said he also expected the candidates who aimed their message at nontraditional audiences, such as NUForce presidential candidate Angela Clements and Independent Candidate John Matzen, to make a better showing.

"I think Angela Clements did a very good job trying to bring students and international groups and underrepresented groups (to the polls)," Schafer said.

"John Matzen tried to bring people who didn't vote in the past," he said.

Despite the candidates' push to reach students who don't traditionally vote, Schafer said it also makes a campaign harder.

"A lot of it comes down to groups of students on campus who do vote," he said.

Schafer said the candidates in the runoff will have to work hard to retain the numbers that voted for them originally.

Many times run-off voter turnout is lower because there are no senate seats or second vice presidential candidates to vote for.

"I think that's going to determine who wins — who can get the majority of their people back to vote," he said.

Conley said during runoffs in years past, students don't vote because their candidate is not represented.

College welcomes new dean

BY SHARON KOLBET

It is a room with a view. In an office that overlooks Memorial Stadium, the new dean of the College of Arts and Sciences said he had one of the best views on campus.

"I could almost sell skybox tickets from here," Richard Hoffmann said, gesturing to the football field as seen from the 12th floor of Oldfather Hall.

Though he looks forward to watching Cornhusker football later this year, right now Hoffmann is getting acquainted with his new office and his new position.

Hoffmann began his term as the new dean of the College of Arts and Sciences on Feb. 1.

Prior to his appointment at UNL, Hoffmann served as dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at the State University of New York at Albany.

"I am glad to be back in the Midwest," Hoffmann said. Before moving to Albany, Hoffmann served for 18 years at Iowa State University in Ames. At ISU, Hoffmann was an associate professor of zoology and genetics.

He also served as associate dean of ISU's College of Liberal Arts and Sciences from 1993-1997 and interim dean of the college from 1997-98.

Hoffmann said that while UNL and Iowa State were both land-grant institutions, the scope of programs offered by the two Big 12 institutions were quite different.

"UNL is a much more balanced college," he said. "Nebraska has a more complete Arts and Sciences program and a much better distribution of graduate programs."

Hoffmann replaces Brian Foster, who left last spring to become vice president and provost at the University of New Mexico in Albuquerque.

served as interim dean.

Pratt said she was confident Hoffmann would continue to move the college forward.

"The biggest challenge is advancing the work of the college on a tight budget," Pratt said.

Hoffmann said he agreed funding was tight but was encouraged by UNL's commitment to academic improvement.
