

For the last three weeks, Professor Bessey has had time to do little more than to attend to his duties as acting chancellor with the legislature and with the board of regents.

Arrangements are being made to provide instruction in dairying next winter term. Such instruction is given with good results in Wisconsin, and is strongly demanded in this state.

The officers of the second prep class for the spring term are: president, J. L. Wallace; vice president, G. L. Town; secretary, R. Reed; treasurer, Miss Cather; sergeant-at-arms, F. Brown.

Although duties at the bank had kept Mr. T. L. Hall away from the halls of the university, he managed to be around before election. There are a few boys in the university that vote, you know.

Mr. Pollard went home sick the first week of school. He returned on the 9th. feeling better. Perhaps a little work at home, as is often the case, made him think that he was not very sick after all.

The college of law, that in all probability will open next fall, will accommodate a large number of the students already here, and will bring a large number of special law students to the university.

Professors Little, Sherman, and Howard the committee from the faculty to co-operate with a like committee from the board of regents, will report on library plans at the June meeting of the board.

The bulletins of the Nebraska experiment station are in great demand, especially the beet sugar bulletins. Recently requests for copies have been received from the state of Washington and from Cuba.

The students of the Latin school were not required to register for this term. As the winter and spring terms are considered one term, we think it would be well to follow the same rule in regard to the college classes.

Professor Horton has designed a new machine for sowing beet seed. It will be made by the Moline Plow company of Illinois, which has made arrangements to send to the experiment station all of its new machines for trial and as samples.

Since the experiment station of Nebraska begun experiments in the sugar beet three years ago, the stations of Kansas, Colorado, both Dakotas, Wisconsin, and Illinois, have made experiments, none of which show as favorable results as the experiments made in Nebraska.

At an early date Professor Barber, at the request of the principal of the high school of Beatrice, will give a lecture, illustrated with stereoptican views, to the people of Beatrice. The lecture will be under the auspices of the high school students, to raise money to purchase apparatus.

For a number of years Mr. Cupid has felt that continued hard labor has been making him nervous. Last year, in this institution, nearly all of his arrows went astray. So, early last fall, he went south for his health. We are informed that Mr. McCrosky and Miss C—have met him since he returned. They were visiting a certain jewelry store together recently.

Lieutenant Griffith has received a letter from an officer of Fort Niobrara, who has accepted the position of professor of military science at the Washington university at St. Louis, asking for information concerning the management of the military department of the university. He has received very flattering reports concerning the efficient management of the military department of this university from an ex-senator, a gentleman that served in the legislature two years ago, who has several times visited the department.

To day the professor of military science will commence a series of lectures on military subjects. It will embrace several lectures delivered last year and two new ones on recent inventions in magazine rifles, on light and heavy artillery, on the new Hotchkiss rifle, which proved so successful at the battle at Wounded Knee, and the new smokeless powder.

He had been out late the night before, far towards the break of dawn; he was sleepy, very sleepy; he couldn't help but yawn. She stepped to reach her English lit., 'twas just behind his chair; just then he stretched his weary arms, and embraced her fair and square. Surprise was pictured on her face; in truth, quite shocked was she, but the boy was just as innocent as any Brook could be.

As the cadets choose the place for the annual encampment, they should endeavor to secure invitations from as many towns as possible. A great many towns of this state do not know that there is an annual encampment of the cadets. This matter should be worked up during the spring vacation. It is just a month until the encampment and if anything is done it must be done quickly. So far we have only two invitations for camp.

Last Friday evening the Delian society held its first oratorical contest. The chapel was well filled and the audience enjoyed a splendid program. Besides several musical selections, the program was as follows: "A Plea for the Sons of the Forests and of the Plains," John L. Marshall, jr.; "The Centralization of Wealth," Arthur C. Pancoast; "The Cause of the Gracchi," Paul Pizey. Mr. Marshall won first place, and Mr. Pizey second. The first prize was $25, given by the alumni of the society; the second prize was $15, given by the society. The Delians are to be congratulated upon the success of their first contest.

The K. C. P's., otherwise known as the knights of the clothes pin, though an order of long standing and having members noted for bravery and nerve, is probably not very well known in university circles. This aggregation of worthy and illustrious lights conceived the brilliant scheme of catching an innocent sophomore and scaring his trembling timorous soul into a nervous chill, by dragging him into a dark office on N street, one night last week. The sophomore did not cave in, but simply smiled and said he would be pleased to afford them any amusement. They could not think of anything more brilliant to do than to turn him loose, and did so. Soon after this a policeman came by and dispersed the aggregation of knights. They have since dissolved.

It was very evident, Sunday evening, March 29, that there was something on Mr. Hyde's mind that refused to slip off. At the supper table he persistently refused to touch the fresh onions of which he is very fond; and every once in a while he would stop, on its way to his open mouth, the richly laden fork. Starting at the corners of his mouth, a smile would gradually grow until he looked a picture of perfect happiness. Although he had eaten not more than he does when company is present, he arose from the table with the others, and went dreamily to his room. Although he was very neatly dressed, he got out a choice piece of neckwear bought just the night before. Standing before the mirror, he saw how happy he was, and the smiles playing "pull away" with his chin and ears for bases, grew so broad that he could scarcely see to arrange the new cravat; but by standing sideways to the mirror, and by looking out of the corner of one eye, he managed to complete his toilet. Soon he was on his way to the depot. Walking up to the train bulletin board, he gazed at the words: "Train from Omaha due at — p. m.," so long, and with a smile on his face so full of meaning, that a
