

bonds and the people that flourish when the the currency is contracted. When the greenbacks are retired silver will then be presented for redemption and the government under the present system will have to redeem it in gold. When Cleveland called an extra session he said in his message to congress that the repeal of the Sherman law would bring back prosperity. It didn't. He sent another message to congress asking for the retirements of the greenbacks. He says that will restore confidence and bring back prosperity. It won't. It is not impertinent to ask this question, did Cleveland know when he asked to have the Sherman law repealed that it would be necessary to retire the greenbacks? If he did he deceived congress and the people when he secured the repeal of that law on the promise of good times again. If he didn't he must admit that he was mistaken, and if wrong, then, is it not likely that he is again? Mr. Bryan advocated the gold and silver coinage of the constitution with greenbacks to supplement the volume when necessary. He strongly opposed banks of issue and argued that the government should be alone entrusted with the issue of all money. He urged the students to investigate this great question and decide it for themselves. If the people understood it they would soon settle it. The difficulty arises from the selfish interests that are always at work and always for private ends and not for the public good. Mr. Bryan was listened to closely for two hours by the large audience and at the conclusion of his lecture many of the students skhook him by the hand and expressed the hope that he would come again. THE HESPERIAN rejoices that the students were privileged to hear the greatest champion of the restoration of silver in this country if not in the world and will anxiously await another opportunity to hear some other phase of the question discussed.

The Great Moral Show.

The Delian society is to be congratulated on its securing Sister Keziah Peak and her unique collection of freaks and famous characters for last Friday evening. Miss Keziah showed that she was not used to the position of manager, yet she evinced considerable skill in the way she managed such a difficult company. A few months in this work would aid materially in her presentation of her characters.

Josiah Allen's wife has not changed at all since we first met her twenty years ago at the Centennial. She spoke in her well known way of the time she went with Josiah to "the pole." She and Miss Splicer, one of the ancient virgins, had evidently been thinking along the same lines, though from different standpoints. Miss Splicer being a young timid and unprotected female, naturally viewed the subject from a different standpoint. Her resolutions for the emancipation of womankind were enthusiastically received.

Brother Jonathan and Daniel McGinty made a pair amply adequate to undertake an affair so delicate as the care for the petrified boy. Daniel's brogue had apparently suffered from the salt water, and on the whole he seemed to wish himself back at the bottom of the sea. As he disappeared before the entertainment was over and "they hain't found him yet," he has probably gone back.

The renowned blind painter compensated in large measure for the fact that the Hayden Art Club has not favored us with an exhibition this year. His offer to take portraits on the spot was not very well responded to by the audience.

The double headed girl was certainly all that was claimed for her—a double headed charmer.

The glass-eater was more at home on the platform than any one in the company with the exception of Samantha. The faith of the audience in his wonderful powers was somewhat shattered, when he crushed the
