

the kitchen door and saw me on the floor crying. Then he said, "Well I am a beast, little girl, to have forgotten your stuff, but I'll go right down town and order the dinner sent up from Don's, then we'll be sure its all right."

That was adding insult to injury. "Sure its all right" indeed!

I told him it would have been all right then, if he hadn't been such a tobacco fiend that he couldn't live half an hour without smoking; and then he said he wasn't particular whether the Clarks had any dinner or not, and that he didn't care if the house did smell like a canning factory.

I said then I wished I had never seen him and he remarked very calmly and sarcastically that he agreed with me perfectly for once. And so it went on until John said if he had known what a temper I had he never would have married me; then I ran out, slammed the door, went up stairs, threw myself on the bed and cried harder than ever.

After while I heard the bell, and then pretty soon John tapped at the door. When I opened it he handed me a note from Mrs. Clark saying that at the last moment the Dr. had been called out of town, so they could not come.

And there I had been cross and ugly to John all for nothing. I told him I was sorry and he declared it was all his fault and told me not to think any more about it; but to get ready and we would go down to the Lincoln for dinner and then go to the opera.

We went and had a lovely time and neither of us have mentioned chickens or cranberries since.
