A FOOTBALL GAME IN JHYME.

I. The Preparation.
The murmur of the rooting swarm
Is like the rumble of a far-off storm,
Warning of death;
The Gridiron is proud of her athletes
gay
Aching at heart to begin the fray
With fiery breath,
Behold yon player's menacing glare
And, as he runs, his crysanthemum
hair,
Like the tail of a comet streams in air,
But lo! "Play ball!" the umpire calls.
The noisy chaos quickly falls
To silence. Each man takes his place,
Resolved, if need be, death to face,
Caring naught for himself, for others
still less,
"Are the players ready?" echoes "Yes."

II. The kick-off.

A whistle shrill,
A soul-felt thrill,
A rush to kill,
And all is still.

III. The Scrimmage.

Half dazed the rushers fall into line,
The quarter pipes the death-fraught sign,
The half-back darts, cuts in and thrusts
Till, tackled low, he bites the dust.

IV. The Touchdown.

The lineman shrieks in high shrill strain
Unheard, "Third down, the line to gain!"
The players huddle together close
With broken nose to broken nose.
The full back bucks the end, moans
"Down."
The struggle's o'er, the victory won.

V. The Goal.

Up toward the goal posts peer all eyes,
Between their arms the pig-skin flies,
A din of frantic yells and cries,
Of cheering hurled into the skies
Up from the maddened crowd takes rise,
Rolls on, grows faint, and far off dies.

THE ABSENT MINDED GIRL.

You can tell her by her vacant, stary eyes, by the upward tilt of her head and her propensity for running into you as you meet her on the campus. You can spot her at once by the different color of her shoes and the absence of her neck-tie. Everybody knows the absent-minded girl. The professors know her. She is always late to class, that is, if she comes at all. She never hears when she is spoken to and always recites in the wrong place. She frequently comes to him and explains that she forgot to come the day before, as if it were the best of excuses. On examination papers she never signs her name and thereby causes lots of trouble. Unhappy is he who boards where she is. It takes some one of the strongest nerves to sit calmly by while she placidly empties the contents of the pepper box over her meat and eats it with a far-away look in her eyes. It is hard not to protest when she absently eats up all the cake on the plate. It seems a little cruel to say nothing when she folds up her handkerchief and carries away the napkin.

The people of the library know her. She takes the European history books and dreams over them by the hour. She borrows fountain pens and pencils and never returns them. She stops in the door and dreams when others are wanting to pass. It is a pity this girl cannot see the pain she causes. At heart she is good. In her rare moments of waking she can be quite charming, but alas! these moments are too rare. She is a creature not of this world. Wings should be given her that she might soar far away to a region where her gifts would be appreciated.
