

around to leeward and stuck our feet through the wheel and braided them together and punched the steering apparatus violently into our stomach. We had an idea that this would hold her up. That's what we did it for, but it was no go, it would lie down and it did; we chose a soft spot where the dust was thick before we let it lie down, so we escaped without much injury. When it had got rested we took it to the top of a hill and two men assisted us to get on. It didn't seem to want to lie down again; it was in a playful mood; it ran down hill and over a basket of eggs with a small boy. Then it jumped the University fence and ran through the hedge. We expostulated again and stuck our feet through the front wheel; the front wheel stopped, but the rear one got its back up and tried to get up on to the seat. The seat isn't very big and we got off, and tried to smell some violets—some of those that will get above the ground next spring; but that blamed thing kept following us up and stepping on us till we got on the fence and its owner came and drove it away. As we said before its owner is an accommodating young man and wouldn't hurt your feelings by refusing to let you ride it if you ask him.

Personalia.
