

sible that he aimed at placing himself on the imperial throne. At any rate he refused to obey the Emperor's orders, and the latter, afraid to oppose him openly even now had him assassinated.

Wallenstein was gone, and another great man was needed. This time it was Richelieu of France that supplied the need. His policy, carried out by himself and others hastened the time when "Germany forgot her animosities in the apathy of exhaustion," and the sword which she had wielded for thirty years fell weakly from her nerveless grasp.

The results of thirty years of warfare for a country that had produced no patriot but had allowed her destiny to be governed by Wallenstein the Slav, by Gustavus the Swede, and by Richelieu the Frenchman were about as follows: France had obtained a portion of her territory, Sweden a portion, armies had swept over her fertile provinces like harrows over ant-hills, "the whole land had dripped with blood, seemed groaning, gasping in perpetual dying," the population had been decreased by more than one half, the morals of her people debauched, their spirits broken and the hope of German unity had been blotted out forever.

We see from the history of this period that it is sometimes most difficult for a nation to succeed, that there may be gaps in human need which Providence does not fill, that there may be a demand which is not satisfied: and we may rest assured that the history of Germany will find a parallel in our country whenever we shall substitute bigotry, and selfishness, and sectionalism, for liberality, and self-denial and patriotism.

The literary editor would say to the man who put in that notice about the shaving parlor, that great men can not grow heavy beards. All the energies are absorbed in the brains.

The question was discussed in the debating club the other night whether it is better to go without a co-ed, or buy a whole candy kitchen and go with one. These two are one and inseparable.

Why don't some ingenious student utilize the school for a flouring mill? The ordinary grind for an average examination would be of sufficient power to get away with the flour of any family.

A prep, who was to take out his first girl the other eve got so excited in dressing that he put his overcoat on under his vest, blacked his boots with the stove brush, and put on his mother's last year bonnet. He got back home astonishingly early.

Holmes has been charged with hypothecating Smith's Classical Dictionary for a certain student in whom he is interested, when thirty history students were frantic to get a peep at it. This exhibition of cold clammy cheek is decidedly to thin for an Assistant Librarian and it is hoped the imp will appreciate his position and refrain from such freaks in the future.
