AN OPINION.

Among the pertinent remarks of the great evangelist from Missouri we find this: "If you throw a stone at a pack of hounds and one of them yells and otherwise acts strangely you may count upon that dog as the one struck by the stone." Although we are no longer among those upon whom is forced the year's work in Military Science, but have timely passed that dangerous period, we can nevertheless from our safe distance see the antics cut by our less fortunate successors as, with look of calm indignation, they come within range. Thus we are emboldened to undertake the duty of emphasizing, of re-voicing the faint echoes which come over to us from those with whom we sympathize and wish it were within our power to grant relief. No one would make so bold as to prescribe for all the members of a class a year's work in a single branch, unless the resultant good gave promise of being an adequate recompense for the work of every member of that class. With the present excellent instructor in that department, the work in Military Science will scarce fail of good results, both in point of training and in amount of information concerning military operations and regulations. Some few are taking the course for the knowledge to be gained, and for those we could conceive of no better opportunity. The number of those specially interested in this work, however, is as one to twelve of those required to complete the course. But the eleven other members required to do this work have each his preference, as does the one inclined to military matters, and it is unjust—to speak mildly—to compel them to do work for which none claim either a general interest or an adequate recompense. We would not be misunderstood. We appreciate the ability of the instructor and the value of the instruction offered, but we would have such instruction relegated to its proper place—the elective department. We wish, moreover, that we might find for those in authority some plausible reason for asking of students this special effort, but can see no sufficient justification unless the act endowing the industrial school be interpreted in such a manner as to require this course. The letter of that article can certainly be taken to read otherwise, and we sincerely doubt if the spirit of it calls for the regime now set up. Indeed, we question if those who framed that act ever dreamed that such construction could be put upon it as would seem necessary to sustain the demands of the present course. Granting, however, that we act in good faith and wish to carry out to the best of our ability the spirit of that article, we are curious to know if there are not other rules and regulations the spirit of which we do not thoroughly appreciate. We have a dim recollection of some provision suggested (?) whereby, the books to be used in the different courses for a term having been selected, the authorities are to furnish them to students at cost. We might recall yet other rules or regulations which are favorable to the student body, but we do not purpose to arouse animosities, nor to locate irregularities, hence we refrain. We are pained to note a feeling, not akin to resignation, among those soon to become eligible to this course of study. Let us, therefore, think of this matter in a fair and friendly way and we may hope to arrive at some more just arrangement.

SANS DETOUR.
