EDITORIAL NOTES.

NOW that the state fair has been located and THE HESPERIAN editors elected, affairs may be expected to resume their normal condition.

FOR two reasons we are a little late this issue; the present board of editors was not elected until about a week before the paper was due; and we felt inclined, since we could not be on time, to be another day behind in order that we might give full account of the Palladian and inter-society contests. In the future we shall endeavor to be on time and hope that hereafter we will not be compelled to ask pardon for tardiness.

THE long expected, much threatened, journal that was to be established in the interests of our Greeks has not yet materialized and we are inclined to think that the project has been indefinitely postponed. What can be the matter with the cultured people of the mystic circle? Surely they have plenty of money with which to engage in any such venture. But perhaps they do not wish to undertake anything so common place; or did they expect that we were going to fall upon them and, weeping bitter tears of repentance, invite them back again? If they supposed that we could not dispense with their assistance they have been laboring under a delusion, as one may infer from a few resolutions in another column.

THERE seems to be a disposition on the part of some of the scientific students to sneer at the efforts made by the literary and classical departments. This should not be. The scientific course has received more attention than any other from the powers that be. There are two buildings set apart for it. Considerable money has been expended in fitting up these buildings. The scientific students while enjoying all their privileges should not look down upon less favored humanity. Since the scientific and military departments are so well provided for, we believe that the other departments should receive some small amount of attention. The classical department is confined to two or three small recitation rooms. We have a classical society which is compelled to meet in a recitation room. If this
