EDITORIAL NOTES.

So much has been said lately about those who borrow THE HESPERIAN from the post office in the hall that we supposed that those who considered it not worth the subscription price would cease from their unholy practice. But in this we are disappointed. Occasionally some one complains that his paper cannot be found in the box and this leads us to believe that there must be some persons around here who do not always regard the rights of a man to his property.

It is amusing to note the manner in which a person acts when he wishes to 'borrow' the paper. He would not have any body think that he would stoop so low as to even notice it. So having cast careful glances up and down the halls he steps lightly up to the box and secures the coveted prize. We recently had the pleasure of seeing one of our prominent Greeks going through such a performance. Now we do not intend to say that frats are the only people who 'borrow' papers from the post office, but we do wish to remark right here that if they desire to have the frat, anti-frat contest fought out without indulging in personalities it will be necessary for some of them to have due regard for the property of others.

The frats seem to have become suddenly alive with enthusiasm for literary societies. They have revived from its slumbers the Philodicean society and posted on the bulletin board programs for every Friday evening of the term, even for the last night when most of the students will be at their homes. We wonder what has happened. Have the two members initiated by the frats this term been able to bring about this change? If so it must be admitted that the barbs excel in literary work. But possibly the frats thought that it would be necessary for them to work new students with the gag that there is as much opportunity for doing literary work in the fraternities as in the literary societies. While things looked 'bright and merry' for the Greeks here they showed no inclinations to do anything in the open society, but now when things are beginning to look rather blue for them they realize that it is necessary to do something and so have resurrected the society. Yet it is not very long ago that some of our Greeks
