A thorough Brewer's Home, on Ninth street, search of the city was made by the by which he was euchered out of police, his relatives and friends, but they failed to find any trace of him.

Mook and his companion having quaffed a great deal of lager at the honest Teuton's bar, easily got into his confidence, and it was not long before they wanted to borrow some money from him. They had plenty of money, but could not just then get hold of it. One of them produced a certificate of deposit on a Chicago bank for $750, and signing this over and giving it up as security, he succeeded in obtaining one hundred dollars from the German. They then jumped the town, leaving their victim to discover that the certificate of deposit wasn't worth the paper it was written on. He soon leagned this fact, and informed the authorities of
