The Senate resumed consideration of the army bill with Bayard on the floor. He made a strong speech and was more conservative in his sentiments than the Democrats who preceded him.

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

Associated Press Report. SENATE.

WASHINGTON, April 21.—Consideration was resumed of the army appropriation bill.

Senator Bayard defended the incorporation of general legislation in appropriation bills, there being nothing unusual in it; hence the cry of revolution was unsubstantial and foolish, and people would condemn it.

Senator Bayard having noticed the remark of Senator Blaine about the distribution of the army, Senator Blaine asked the Senator to quote his words.

Senator Bayard said he would do so, but would first have to send for the Congressional Record.

Senator Blaine remarked that what he said was this: "that not a Senator on the other side of the chamber had ever seen a United States soldier at the polls."

Senator Bayard replied that if the Senator preferred to limit his remarks to the actual vision of the Senators he had nothing to say.

Senator Bayard then proceeded to read a circumstantial account of a large presence of troops in New York in the fall of 1870 to be present at the polls to prevent disorder.

Senator Blaine wished to ask a question. It was by the Senator did not select a precedent in 1857, when President Buchanan called out marines to attend a Washington municipal election, and when seven men were shot down by them, the scene being within a mile of the Senate chamber.

Senator Bayard said he would discuss that question at some future time. Any party or set of men in this country who seek to remove the infringement on the liberties of the American people should have his support at all times. He held that the employment of the armies at the polls at the South was simply atrocious, and during the war was claimed as a belligerent right. Senator Bayard at some length condemned all conduct which would tend to prevent the restoration of full confidence and friendship to all party of the country.

He was assured that the hostility of one section against the other would speedily lead to depression and degradation, and ultimate ruin of both, and in conclusion expressed his confidence that the American people would support the majority in their present legislation as it was in the direction of justice and had for its object the protection of the liberties of the people.

Senator Maxey said it was plain the constitution did not confer upon the United States government authority to regulate elections, therefore it could not modify an act allowing such action. Senator Maxey alluded to former remarks of Senator Blaine, that thirty of the southern Democratic Senators taken part in the civil war, but he (Maxey) would ask did they not attend to their duties, and were they not as mindful of the public interests and as decorous in their intercourse with the Senate from any other part of the Union? Their crime consisted in their inability to see with the eyes of others. They would however follow their own course, right or wrong, not thinking when they will please or displease by doing so. By right, under the constitution they were entitled to assist on this floor. Mr. Blaine might rest content that they would assert equal rights of their States with others of the Union. They did not attempt to stir up the passions of the people, but were content in the reconciliation and restoration of genuine brotherhood among the people of a common destiny and country. The Senator from Maine also alluded to the name of Lincoln, and President Tyler. He alluded to Lincoln the fairness of thought and fearlessness of action. In his last moments he was full of charity for all malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see right, etc. The South should have taken the right, and according to the North the same degree of right. The revival of strife and contention of the past would do no good but much harm. He would rather see the Union broken up than see it broken up by the war, and in securing prosperity in all its parts.

After an executive session the senate adjourned.
