Some who desired to speak refused to do so, unless there was a strict understanding that no one would divulge either the names of the speakers or the substance of their speeches. Hence there was an extra bond of secrecy established. It is known, however, that Senator Dawes made a speech in which he introduced an idea of reluc tance to abandoning the right for the state to have a voice in filling her important offices. He admitted that his ultimatum had been expressed to the executive, but gave no indication of what action his committee would take. He reviewed the usages of the senate and of the executive in such matters, and detailed his objections to the ab-
