SPIRITED AWAY.

Why the Crooks Always Make Toward the River.

Escaping.

Omaha is infested with some pretty get in such predicaments that it beto other localities, temporarily at least. This is very easy to accomplish, and whenever the exigencies of a crook's" case require flight he can speedily transfer himself from Nebraska into Iowa. This is done by means of a small number of these skiffs along the river bank used by fishermen and ferrymen. There is one man living near the river who, while he is not the possessor of a boat, will readily agree to carry a man across the river for a compensation. He presses into service any boat that he may find, and is well known to all Omaha crooks. Whenever there is a robbery committed or any other matter which requires a temporary exile, this man can always be found ready to ferry the offender over. He gauges the pockets of his customers and charges accordingly. Sometimes when the fugitive has made a big haul and is very anxious to evade the police, who are upon his track, he is made to pay a very large percentage of his spoils to this voracious ferryman. Of course this division is objectionable to the crook, bound to give whatever he is asked. sented. When any depredation is committed at or near the depots the offender is

The Solution of the Mooted Liquor Question.

To the Editor of The Bee. OMAHA, Sept. 2. - I think the solution of what is termed "the liquor question" is not so difficult and unapproachable as it may seem at first

Taking it for granted that the high license law is the law of the land and must by all law-abiding men be implicitly tollowed and practiced, let us consider with moderation how its provisions can be carried out in the least onerous manner to respectable dealers in fermented liquors. And there are quite a number of respectable people who sell beer and liquor, who would not sell to minors, drunkards or loafers, and would not permit their presence even.

As suggested in your paper, the quarterly payment, or rather three months' "license fee," would be a fair way, for the many reasons which THE BEE advances, of meeting the otherwise large and compulsory outlay And then when all the other preliminaries and joints of this legal system, not difficult to responsible persons have been fitted together at the last comes the bond. Now, then, we remember Shylock and the pound of flesh; and all the pains and penalties which attach to the "liquor bond" are magnified. If we premise that the sentiments of society degrade drunkenness and gambling common plane of criminal law, yet we cannot fail to acknowlege that perance is not prohibition," and as there will be to the end of time-a minority, thank Heaven-of those who abuse the benefits of eating and drinking, of social amusements and of social intercourse, yet who will not condemn the infringement, and who

To say that prohibition is a virtue is but a poor endorsement of the God-given reasoning faculties of man, and involves a censorship which would fail in its execution

UNCLE JOHN.

He Drops Around to Explain That He Isn't Dead.

Uncle John Stanton took occasion te drop around to THE BEE office last night to explain that he hadn't been fished out of the river or anything of that sort. Uncle John showed his usual disregard for the niceties of dress and wore a linen apron which bore a suspicious resemblance to a portion of his shirt. Selecting the most harmless looking member of the staff he went on to explain that he was in unusually good spirits, and was still a healthy though somewhat ancient community. In verification of the statement that he hadn't suicided in the river he extended a general invitation to everybody to accompany him to the Missouri and watch him glide across. "I'm not at all mad," continued Uncle John with his usual graceful persuasiveness, "but I'd like you to come out to-morrow and deny that I was drowned or anything of that kind. Not at all cross you know," he resumed with the airy grace of sweet sixteen, "for with all your faults I love you still. You'll correct it, wont you? Ah, I knew you would. Tra la la." And Uncle John sought the darkness on the outer side of the door.
