BURNED HORSEFLESH.

Seven Animals Burned to Death in a Fire

The Loss About Twelve Hundred Dollars.

Seven fine draught horses met a horrible death in John Frank's stable, in the rear of his hotel on Eleventh and Douglas streets, yesterday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The stable was a small frame story and a half structure. It was divided into three compartments. In the rear compartment a pair of mules were kept, while in the others were lodged eight horses, two to a stall. The ceiling was about eight feet high, and in the upper portion was stored a small quantity of hay. A commotion among the horses first attracted attention. In a moment afterward the whole stable flashed out into a sheet of flames and the fire was well under way even before the alarm could be sent in. The fire had got pretty well started when the pair of mules in the rear part of the stable set their heels to work in the liveliest kind of style and soon had made an exit for themselves. They got out of the building with a rapidity that Maud S. might envy. All the horses were tied securely in another portion of the stable, but efforts to liberate them proved unavailing. One big grey horse succeeded in jerking himself loose and made a wild plunge for the door. He was fortunate in judging its locality and bursting it open made his exit with a frightened neigh and disappeared. Meantime the flames were dancing fantastically around the interior of the stable which had by this time become so hot that the hide of the horses was actually cracking. The mate of the horse which had just escaped, a moment later succeeded in losing himself. He was not so fortunate as the other animal because before he could reach the door he fell overcame by the heat and died with his nose sticking outside the doorway. The others could not free themselves from the stalls and so died.

The fire department got on the scene in good shape and were soon at work. Three well-directed streams of water had a discouraging effect on the fire which soon simmered down into fitful blazes. This was accomplished notwithstanding that the fire was surrounded by inflammable frame buildings. The firemen did an admirable piece of work. The flames once subdued the crowd gathered about the stable, which was only partially consumed, to see what had become of the horses. The seven were scattered about the floor, a shriveled, contorted set of objects fearful to behold. One animal lay near the door, the only one apparently which had escaped from his fastenings until they were actually burned away. Two others had met death side by side and were found lifeless in the same stall. The others were scattered about the stable promiscuously. All seemed to have made violent efforts to escape. Every one of them had been literally baked alive. They lay there in their horrible deformity the whole afternoon, objects of curious stares from crowds of people. The fire was probably of incendiary origin. The owner of the animals, John Frank, was on the Sixteenth street bridge when the alarm sounded and by the time he could arrive the horses were dead. He fortunately had a couple of coats with him which he had been exercising. He valued the animals at $225. The loss on harness and stable will bring these figures up to about $1,200.

The fire is an unfortunate blow to Frank, who is a hard working, industrious man. As he did not have any insurance everything is a total loss.
