PEARLS BOOMING.

This Season's Fishing—Where the Gems are Found—Their Market Value.
"No," an expert said to a reporter in answer to a question, "finding pearls in fresh water is nothing new, but somehow the business has received a boom, and I should say that there were probably two or three hundred persons spending a part of their time collecting them. They are found from Texas to Ohio. St. Clair county, Ill., and Rutherford county, Tenn., are good places for them, but the largest was found near Salem, N. J., a number of years ago. It was about an inch across and it sold in Paris for $2,000. Most of them are very small and sell in lots for small sums, but one large one was found for the time. Along the Ohio river all the boatmen and fishermen are in the business, especially boys. They wade about the flats and scoop up the ones with their hands, while others have regular arrangements for hauling them up by the quantity. The best are perfectly round and white, with rich orient. The next shape is the pear. Some are perfect all but one side, and this can be concealed in the setting.
"Small pearls for use in onyx need not be perfect, as they are half hidden in the setting, so the imperfect ones have a value as well. The best pearls, the round ones, are those found in the mantle of the animal. You see, the pearl, either in fresh or salt water, is merely the result of the animal's attempt to protect itself.
"Have attempts been made to force the growth of pearls?
"Yes, the great naturalist Linnæus thought he had discovered a plan to cause the pearl to grow, which was to irritate the parasites already mentioned. The pearl mussels were taken from the water and the shells bored, then placed back and left for four or five years. The Swedish government paid him $1,800 for the idea, but it did not prove a success. The Chinese have done well with the pearl oyster. They sprinkle sand over the beds when the oysters or mussels are open, and also put little images in the shells that soon become coated with a pearly luster. These can be seen at the Central Park museum. In Japan a similar plan is adopted with the unio hyria.
"Is it possible to make spurious pearls?
"It would be hard to deceive a dealer, but they are made so skillfully that it is extremely difficult to tell. For years a bogus pearl manufactory was carried on at Murano, a little town near Venice. The forms were made of glass, while the iridescent or orient was produced by quicksilver; but they were chiefly used as beads for the peasantry. Finally, the French took up the business, and d noticing the richness of fishes' scales, they used them to produce the luster, and with great success. The dace and the roach were the fishes used. In Italy the smelt is taken from the Tiber, and its scales yield an extremely rich secretion of mucus that can be used for the purpose; but to the eye accustomed to the real pearl these imitations are so much dross, and I can hardly better express the difference than to say that the spurious ones seem dead and devoid of the bluish and sparkle that is the beauty of the real pearl. The latter needs no artistic adornment to set it off. Held in the hand and subjected to the closest scrutiny it appears best.
One Night at Chicago.
Seven o'clock p. m. on the North Side.
Night, sombre-hued night, had stretched for her long, gaunt arm and covered the earth that was lately so bright and joyous with a black mantle that seemed, in contrast with the laughing, sun-gilded earth of two hours before, as if the wedding dress of a fair young bride had been replaced by the hideous pall that one sees covering the coffins of those who have left us forever.
Up a broad avenue, on each side of which stood stately mansions, from which came the gleam of the mellow gaslight and the ruddy blaze of the glowing grate fire as it leaped bravely up the chimney and roared and crackled away as though in boisterous glee at its own efforts to make everything seem bright and cheery, a young man, stout of limb and handsome of face, walked with a quick, firm tread that betokened an active nature and a goodly income.
Pausing in front of one of the most imposing residences of which the thoroughfare could boast, he ascended the steps, rang the bell, and in an instant had pressed closely to his bosom a fair young girl whose eyes, as they looked into his, spoke volumes, illumined as they were by the tender radiance of a love that lived alone for him, and would burn as with a bright and unwavering flame whether its possessor sat high in his limo or trudged on foot as he wandered alone and unprotected amid the trackless wastes of St. Louis.
"I thought I should find you 'at home, my sweet," said George W. Simpson as he stooped and kissed the rosy lips held up to him with a warm, clinging kiss that sounded like a man man pulling the valve out of a broken pump.
A slight shudder passed over Myrtle's frame. George had unconsciously put his cold nose in her eye.
"You're shivering from me, darling," he said in low suppressed tones, for he had noticed the movement, slight though it was.
"I ain't, neither," responded Myrtle.
Heaven help her; she had been educated at Vassar.
The clock had struck eleven. Myrtle and George were standing in the hallway, her arms twined about him in the ecstasy of a first love.
"Are you will love me always, George?" Myrtle said softly.
"Yes, my precious one, forever and ever."
"And when shall we be married?" came in low, dulcet tones from the girl, as her head nestled confidently against his liver-pad.
Now was George W. Simpson's long-for opportunity. Two years before Myrtle had laughed a merry, heartless laugh when he had seated himself in a pie at a picnic. Draw-

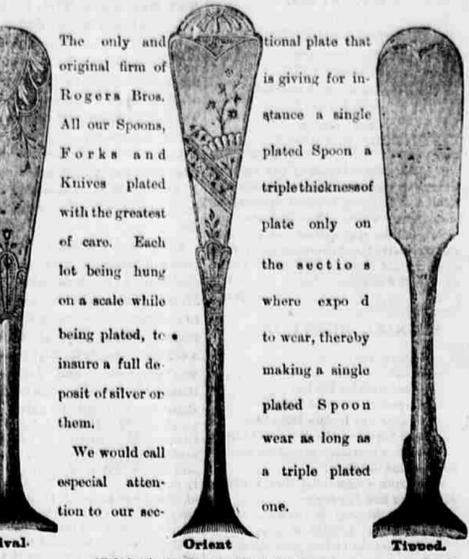

BUTTING OUT HIS BRAINS.

A Lunatic's Battle with "Demons" Ends with Death.
St. Louis Republic.
At about 8:30 o'clock Sunday evening a large, brawny man with square shoulders and heavy limbs, with his hair standing on end, his eyes starting out of his head, and with large beads of sweat clinging to his reddened face, rushed headlong into the Chestnut street station, and just saved himself from falling on the floor by grasping the railing. He shivered all over and his eyes darted to one side or another with a terrible wildness. He gasped out, "Save me!"
Officers Rilliet looked at the terrified human being, but a single instant when he discovered that the man was suffering from delirium tremens. He asked the creature what was the matter, and in accents thick the man gasped out that four men were following him and shooting at him with pistols. He beseeched the police to save him from his pursuers. They were right behind him, pointing their pistols at him, the triggers were just falling on the cartridges.
THE MAN WRENCHED ABOUT, but could feel that they were behind him again. He was taken back to one of the cells and locked in. He still shivered and he clung to the great oak bars of the cell tenaciously, and pressed his great flaming eyes and face through the openings between. The pursuers were with him in the cell. He shouted and screamed for help, but none came. He quieted down for a time and was still. At about 2 o'clock in the morning the man who gave his name as William W. Hays, the fellow once more. He stood at the rear end of his cell as if to escape something on the outside before the door. Then, with a loud scream, he dashed with his head down at the oak bars. He struck them squarely and fell, but got up again and did it several times before Officer Rilliet and Turnkey Scarritt could reach him. They bore him to the floor and FASTENED HIS ARMS and his legs with the strongest bonds they had, but he broke the ropes and again began to make himself a battering ram to force the iron and oak bars from their places. Then he took a strong leathern thong from around his waist, a thong with which he kept his pantaloons from falling. This he placed around his neck, crossed it, and catching an end in each hand tugged with might and main to choke himself. He partially succeeded, but he spluttered and stammered and Rilliet and Scarritt rushed in and caught him. He was unconscious, but they gave him whiskey and he revived. Then they tied his legs and placed the handcuffs on him. He lay on his back in the cell trying TO BITE THE FLOOR. until an ambulance, which had been sent for, arrived. He was put in the ambulance and hurried out to the city hospital.
There he remained during the day until five o'clock yesterday afternoon. He had been raging and foaming in his cell during the day, but at about that time it was unusually quiet in the cell. An attendant passing that cell, Hoag was lashed with his legs stretched out on the floor and his hands hanging by his side. He had torn up his clothes and made a noise. He tied one end to one of the bars just a few feet from the floor. The other end was around his neck. He had only to stand upright and fall and be choked to death.
Hoag's residence is not known, neither is it known where he came from. He appeared to be about 45 years old and, as has been stated before, a man of herculean frame.

The Flathead Indians and Garfield.
Butte (Montana) Letter to Philadelphia Press.
The Flathead Indians live in the beautiful valley of Bitter Root, the garden spot of Montana, and there for many years have occupied their fertile, fruit-producing prairies in spite of the machinations of prospectors and Indian agents. A year or two ago Gen. Garfield was sent out by congress as the representative of the government in the difficulties between the settlers and the Flatheads, which at the time of his visit seemed to have crystallized. Congressman Garfield came through Butte and Helena, and crossing the Bitter Root mountains, which shut in the fairest valley in the northwest, came among the disaffected Indians to council on the banks of the beautiful Flathead lake. To-day a prospector who has just returned from the shores of the lake reports the whole tribe in mourning. Garfield's heart went out to them in the day of their great trouble, when the effort was being made to drive them out of their hereditary Eden; to-day their hearts go in sorrow to his memory, and he will live in their recollection henceforth, as he has done since his visit. The kindly representative of their Great Father ever seen among the red men. It is actually true that the Flatheads know of his death and mourn him. Said one very old chief to the prospector already mentioned as he left the valley last Friday: "Flathead go now. Great Father dead. No more home for red men." His words will doubtless prove true, since the white population of Montana with one accord envy the Flatheads their beautiful valley, and tried the best to induce Gen. Garfield, when arbitrating the matter, to remove the Flatheads from the territory.

TRICKING TABOR.

How the Mining Millionaire Missed a Superb Solitaire.
Ger. Cincinnati Enquirer.
The handsomest diamond ring said to be worn by any one on the stage sparkles on the little white hand of a rather magnificent but very pretty performer, known as "Stella," of the Soldado troupe. When that highly refined and aesthetic company played in Denver, some one introduced this particular star to Governor Tabor, who is a generous patron of music.
During a brief conversation with her the magnate was summoned on business by a messenger. As he withdrew he, it is presumed unconsciously, remarked that he would finish his call some other time. "Oh no, you won't," said the jaunty performer; "you will get so absorbed in these great big names and political things that you'll forget all about poor little me."
The divot star on gubernatorial gaitry was equal to a challenge. At any rate, the governor pledged himself to return. "Ah, I don't believe any of you wicked western men without some other guarantee than your word," said
THE CLEVER MISS STELLA.
Adding, "Leave me something valuable enough to insure your return." Now, the governor of Colorado has many bags of gold, but he does not carry them in his pockets, and the only ornament of cost he wore was a magnificent diamond ring, the only huge solitaire, valued at $15,000, shining out like an electric light.
The impulsive millionaire threw his jewel into her lap and made his exit. Then the smart Stella, without loss of time, packed her little portmanteau, skipped on a train bound for Chicago. When the governor called to redeem his pledge the news of her departure was broken to him by a colored waiter.
Governor Tabor is gifted with a shrewd head and a good heart. It was the latter that enabled him to put the former to such good use. Three years ago he was keeping a little grocery store. One day
TWO ROUGH-LOOKING IRISHMEN came to him. They had not a cent and were trying their luck at mining. They asked him to give them credit and promised him one-third of their find in return. He had not much faith in their luck, but they were so woe-begone and destitute that he agreed to the bargain.
The men lived on scanty fare, but slowly their bill increased until it reached the sum of $29.30. The grocer felt the $30 indebtedness must close the account in justice to his family; but on the very day the amount was reached the two men struck the mine that afterward was known as the "Little Pittsburg." Tabor received $1,000,000 as his share, and then bought out the others who had less faith in the resources of the mine.
After making an immense amount of money out of the mine, he was induced by two sharpers to buy another, which proved to be "swindled." The sharpers who palmed it off on him ceased to smile, when, nothing daunted by the discovery of the sham, their victim began operations that brought to light a valuable vein, and made him
WORTH MILLIONS.
After this everything that Governor Tabor undertook proved successful, and, as he is willing to spend his money freely for the public benefit, he maintains his popularity. He occupies an elegant suite of apartments at the Windsor hotel, and his wife, a handsome residence which he had built for her and which is surrounded by beautifully laid-out grounds. She has an allowance of $12,000 a year for dress, and both of them seemed to find the arrangement satisfactory.
