CIRQUE PUPILS IN MID-AIR.

Where Signor Sebastian and Other Performers Practice in Winter.

Auctioneer Van Syckle tried to sell the West End training academy at Marion, N. J., on Wednesday, but because the highest bid made for it and the ground on which it stands was only $1,400, the sale was postponed for a week.

"You'll see more fun than you ever before in one evening," said Ringmaster W. H. Conklin, as he plucked a grain of sawdust off his $550 costume of satin, silk, and lace that was hanging in a cloud.

"I stand here," said the ringmaster, "holding the arm of the dierrick around the ring. The rope extends up to the end, where it runs over a pulley. From the pulley it descends to a leather belt around the waist of the pupil astride of his horse. If he is a beginner, I let him ride around two or three times, and then I let him to get upon his hands and knees upon the pad, a broad-backed saddle. This is a much harder thing to do than you can do almost anything on a horse in the way of hurdle riding on a straight course, finds a great change when the horse leans on a sharp run around the ring. Most beginners succeed in getting on their hands and knees. When they begin to feel pretty steady in the position I tell them to get up on their feet. As soon as they rise every beginner then tumbles over backward. He can't help it. Then it would make you double up with laughter. I come down on this rope on my own weight, and he goes around the ring dangling at the end of the rope, pawing the air with his arms and legs. Sometimes he is over his horse trying to get a footing on the pad; sometimes he is behind him clutching for his tail, and sometimes he is ahead of him.

"Besides this academy there is one in Newtown, L. I., and one in Connecticut. A circus performer has to practice once a week during the winter, and he ought to practice twice a week in order to keep his muscles in play. This place was run under the name of Signor Sebastian and myself last winter. He is the champion rider of the world, and it is no wonder, for he says that his mother rode in the ring and that he was born in a dressing room. We often had a hundred spectators here when he and other stars used to practice.

"The reason why the owners want to sell is that they went into a speculation to train trick horses, and trick horses have lost their attractiveness to the public."—New York Sun.

"The World's Wants." William Walker, "the gray-eyed man of destiny," and himself an editor, used to say that no man knew how to enjoy a newspaper who did not read the advertisements. And he was right. Let the reader try the experiment, if he never has done so, and cast his eye through the advertising columns of the paper he now holds in his hands.

Wanted—Help. This column opens up the whole domestic play called "servantism." It tells, too, of trades people in want of steady men for salesmen and bright boys for errands, of tailors who want cutters, managers who want clerks, and preachers who want old sermons.

Wanted—Situations. This column tells the tale of poverty, anxiety and distress, as well as of thrift and industry; struggles of the poor but recently brought to want, pathetic pleas for impossible work and offers to toil for mere subsistence. Interspersed with these are the advertisements of first-class cooks, of never so much as a good meal, of coachmen who never drive a horse except behind a plow, and of others, real experts in their business.

Wanted—Rooms; quiet, second floor, south front, northwestern section, comfortably furnished, convenient to cars, neatness, etc., etc. These advertisers are the seekers for the ideal. They wander about from year to year to find the rooms to which no objection can be made. They clasp the phantom, and they find it air. The real rooms which are to be found are advertised in another column, under the head of "For rent—rooms."

For rent—rooms. And oh! the clation of seeker and renter when the former, having read the description of what he wants, pulls the door bell of the latter, and they meet at the opening door. Let the veil be drawn as the room-hunter turns up his or her nose at the eloquent advocacy and defense of the apartments by the landlord or lady. "The new and the old, the bright and the gloomy, are all described alike in the advertisements. We leave the parties to settle the matter for themselves, and as we retire we can fancy we hear again an old-time voice saying, as she leads the way through a dark and narrow passage to a room with one window looking out upon a small back alley: "Here is a very cheerful room."

Speaking of rooms to rent reminds us of what a western wag said who had held a bureau office here under Grant, and who was by him transferred to a local office in his own home. "No man," said he, "can describe my inexpressible relief at getting safely out of Washington. I had been in mortal dread of finding myself out of office and dead broke, and when the nightmare visited me my disorder of fancy invariably represented me to myself as occupying an old tumble-down building, on one corner post of which was the sign, 'Claim Agent, With or Without Board.'" the money, but who contemplate leaving town; furniture to sell by others who "decline housekeeping" and whose housekeeping has declined; stoves set up and removed; clothes made to order and portable property received on pawn; lost and found puddles and pocket-books, sums of money, valuable papers, and here is one of a lost lady—no, a lady's lost shoe, "left foot, No. 2," (how many gallants are seeking it far and wide for the promised reward)—education, mutton, poultry tickets, railroads and steamboats, hotels and theaters, undertakers and milliners, and so on, to the end. Certainly advertising is a most interesting branch of literature, and a pleasant relief from the dull and hackneyed editorial page.

How He Came Out.

Items have, during the past few years, frequently appeared telling how western desperadoes had dashed on back into saloons and run the ranch to suit themselves until they became tired of the sport and left. They now work such things a little different in some portions of Colorado. The Gunnison Free Press, a new and nest little journal, says: "A drunken individual rode his horse into the Retreat Saloon on lower Main street, Thursday, and demanded a drink for himself and animal, and began to abuse everybody around the place. In a few minutes after his entrance he came rattling in, mounted his horse, stood, but on the toe of the proprietor's boot."
