

ANCIENT MINES. A New Town Whose Vicinity Has an Interesting Old History. The Spaniards and Descendants of the Montezumas.

New Mexican News. Not many miles southwest of Santa Fe, on the A., T. & S. F. railroad, is the little town of Cerrillos, which has become within the past few months one of the most noted mining camps in New Mexico.

About two miles north of Cerrillos near the old Mina del Tierra, is one of the old chalcophilous or turquoise mines, from which, it is said, a part of the crown jewels of Spain were obtained. This turquoise mine is in a mountain composed of soft white stone resembling magnesia limestone.

PRISON LIFE IN SING SING.

Dreary Scenes Within Stone Walls. "We have a great trouble with prisoners in consequence of their stealing," said Warden Brush to a Tribune reporter one evening recently, as he sat in his office in the prison in Sing Sing.

"Mr. Fury had an interesting experience some time since in the egg trade," the Warden went on, dryly. "The men are allowed a good supply of eggs daily. On this occasion several of them saved the shells carefully and filled them with potato. Then they sent them back and complained that the eggs were rotten. They managed to get about twenty extra eggs that time."

"Do you ever have any trouble in dealing with the convicts?" "Not to amount to anything. Some of them are always complaining of being injured by some other convict. But we never pay any attention to that, for we cannot believe a word one of them says. They would as willingly lie as eat as a rule. There are exceptions, of course, men who are square and are perfectly trustworthy. If we were to believe their stories, some one would be lying somebody into trouble all the time. Occasionally we have cases where the convict gets under the delusion that we are determined to kill him off, and he falls into a form of insanity. We had a powerful Italian here at one time who got into this state of mind. He was the strongest fellow I ever saw. His muscles were something marvelous to look at. There was not, apparently, a superfluous ounce of flesh upon him. He gradually grew weak, and one night he was found in his cell strapping a knife to his back and trying to kill himself. We put a stout man on him and fastened him in the bed with two belts. In about an hour, the keeper on going to his cell could see nothing of him in bed. The fellow had got loose, had stripped himself again, and had hidden under the bed. We were obliged to repeat the proceedings and secure him more tightly. Such episodes occur occasionally, but in the main there is no serious trouble."

At the suggestion a tour of parts of the building was then made. It was then about 8 o'clock in the evening. In most of the cells the small oil lamps of most of the convicts were still burning. The men were given an allowance of oil each week, just enough to last until 9 o'clock. If they burn oil beyond this time one night, they lose so much before the week is out. A great many were lying in bed reading and smoking cigars. "We have a library," said the Warden, "and then ladies send us a great many magazines and story papers."

laced. The men have to smoke first-hand out of the pipe, but they get along very well with it. Occasionally a contumacious could be seen close behind the bars. One of the convicts was standing up to scold the visitors, and so far as his stolid countenance would allow it, he seemed to take a sullen heavy pleasure in seeing something new and alive before him.

In the hospital there were only four patients. Two of them were convalescent. One of them had burned both his hands badly. The Warden seemed to take a special interest in this case. He stepped up to the convict, who was seated reading at a low table beside his bed. The man rose as the Warden approached. He was a man from fifty to sixty years of age, and had the stolid countenance and heavy eyelids of a convict. His hair was black, his eyes small and piercing, and his face expressed suspicion and cunning held in check by the thought that it would not answer to let the evil part of his nature appear too plainly. He was very deferential to the Warden and assumed a suffering air.

A pitiable and interesting case was that of young McCarty, as the name appeared on the register. This was an alias, however. McCarty had been sent to prison for two years for stealing. He was suffering from consumption when received. The poor fellow lay in his cot. He was undoubtedly in the last stages of his disease, and had an intelligent face, and was apparently about thirty years of age. The Warden stepped slowly up to his cot. "Well, McCarty, almost through?" the Warden asked in a quiet way. "Yes, Warden, this is the last day. I'm out to-morrow," McCarty replied. His voice scarcely above a whisper. "How are you feeling?" "Oh, I'm stronger."

"What are you going to do?" "God only knows, Warden! I've got $15 left. But how long will that keep me? I suppose I must go to New York. If somebody only knew of my case and would give me $5 to help me on to Philadelphia, I could do something there. I could earn $3 a day there. God knows I don't want to be driven to stealing again. He spoke with broken breath, almost out parts of his speech. "Are you strong enough to go?" the Warden asked. "Yes I'm going. My legs are heavy, and they won't work very well, but I'm going. If only had an overcoat it would protect me from the cold. I'm afraid of the raw air. Do you think, Warden?" he asked appealingly. "That there might be an old overcoat lying around that I could have?" "Don't give yourself any trouble about that, McCarty. I'll see you are fixed out with everything you want."
