"A SHINER."

How the Leadville Man Won Back the Money Lost at Poker.

Denver News.

One of the aristocratic institutions of Leadville, say a correspondent, is the mining club—an organization composed of the blue-blood of the city, and not exactly, as the name implies, made up of mining magnates. The apartments of the organization include a dainty furnished little apartment sacred to the great American game of draw poker. Here the club men are wont to congegate of an evening, and sometimes the game runs high. Now, in draw poker, even "among gentlemen," the player prefers to win rather than to lose, and, consequently, some desperate points are occasionally strained. A few evenings ago a well known member, the superintendent of a mine east of the city—sat down in a game of the hardest and heaviest players in the camp. In about an hour he quit just $750 poorer than when he sat down. Later in the evening he disconsolately narrated the fact to a friend, and cursed gambling and gamblers in a loud, deep and emphatic style. It so happened that this friend was a trifle more "fly," in the vernacular of the gang, than he, and, closing one optic, told him he could assist him in making the mining club look remarkably sick, as far as draw poker was concerned. The mining man expressed his willingness to be assisted, and the "fly" produced what is technically known as a "shiner." This may be a dark and gloomy mystery to those uninitiated, but to old sports it is far from one. A "shiner" is nothing but a silver dollar, on one side of which a concavo mirror about the size of a man's little finger nail is set. This is brightly polished and is unnoticed in the surrounding silver. When the game begins the "shiner" is lain on top of pile of notes and coin and the cards dealt over it. The result is that the concave mirror catches the reflection of all cards dealt over it, and the dealer has a pretty accurate knowledge of what every body else holds. A few lessons made the mining man an adept, and, armed with the "shiner," he hied him to the mining club. A poker game was in progress, and he took his seat at the table. For the next couple of hours the players were tempted to think that he had become gifted with the powers of a clairovyant or mind-reader, so singularly accurate was his knowledge of what they held. At the end of that time he had the crowd in such a state of utter and comple dead-brokeness that they were obliged to stand off the steward of the club for their potatoes. Since then the mining club has experienced a season of financial depression which seriously lamed their political potency in the city election.

Too Much Nobility.

Indianapolis Sentinel.

Some year ago a very foolish woman, the wife of the Bonanza King, Mackey—a name that smacks precious little of blue blood—concluded that the American continent was not big enough to hold her and her daughter, and therefore she set sail for Europe, located in Paris, built, hired, or purchased a sort of palace, fitted it up with servants, got the name of "Bonanza Queen," hung out her shingle as the richest woman in the gay capital, gave big dinners, called around her all the aristocratic, titled snobs, she could catch with that sort of bait, and was happy to see her name in and glowing reports of her nauseating nonsense in Parisian cheap prints, which were from time to time reproduced in American journals. While the Bonanza Queen was slinging money away by thousands, the old Bonanza King remained in America to see that the "balance of trade" didn't get on the wrong side of his ledger and compel him to stop shipping gold to France. To make this whole disgusting business as distasteful and as repugnant as possible, the old "Bonanza Queen" has managed to make it appear that her daughter is in demand, and all the broken down heirs of the defunct dynasties of Europe are besieging her palace asking for the hand of the daughter in marriage—the last one of the suitors mamed, being Prince Philippe de Bourbon, an obscure dead-beat of Spanish stock. It seems this fighting family, being broke had it published that he was affianced to the daughter of the Bonanza Queen, Mlle. Mackey; whereupon the Mackey mamma gets into a royal rage, and declares that Prince Philippe de Bourbon authorized the report and permitted it to be published to save himself from arrest on account of debts. It is now reported that the Bonanza Queen will have a post erected near the front gate, upon which notice will be given in all European languages that the Princess Cotilda Margueretta Antoinetta Peggietta Bridgetette Mackeyronia will have no dowry until her Bonanza parents are dead. But the average aristocratic titled dead-beat is not likely to heed the Queen's notice, and Mademoiselle Mackeyronia will continue to receive offers until she at last capitulates, and then the King and Queen will have to shell out. When an American woman goes to Europe to act the fool, she is not deserving of sympathy if her schemes do not pan out according to expectations.

Woeful Story of the Mississippi Flood

Arkansas State Gazette.

People who read daily reports from the overflowed districts may be surprised from day to day at the enormity of the inundation; at the number of people rendered homeless; of the hunger and general devastation; but few, removed as they are from the scene, can realize in detail the actual misery and want. The following story, told by an old man who arrived in this city yesterday, gives one of the many instances the terrors of which cannot be exaggerated:

"My name is Hiram Aspin," said the old man, when a gentleman, hearing something of his recent misfortunes, had invited them to join them at a lunch table. "For several years I have lived on the Mississippi river, a few miles below Arkansas City. For some time I have been living alone, as my wife died several years ago."

"Tell us about the flood, old man," said one of the party, who, caring but little about family affairs, desired a straightforward story of distress.

"My house was situated, it was thought, at a safe distance above high-water mark, and every one agreed that only a terribly inundation, incident to a general break in the levee, could affect me. When the break in the levee occurred I was in bed. The howling of my dog and the restlessness of the horses in the lot warned me of my danger. I arose and opened the door and then realized what a terrible flood was coming. The horses jumped the fence, snorted, and ran away. The dog howled, looked appealingly at me, and tucking his tail ran under the house. The water came with gurgling rush. I did not think that the water would attain a dangerous depth, and for temporary safety I climbed upon the gate-post. The dog had ceased howlig. He was under water. One of my chickens flew by me and fell into the water with a fluttering splash. The water rose higher and higher. It roared through the bottoms like thunder. When morning came I stood upon the top of the post and surueyed the scene. A yellow sea was stretched out before me. I had no means of escape. A log floated past me. I sprang from the gate post and clung to the timber. All day I floated. Occasionally the log would turn and give me a dip. A lonely, terrible night followed. Another day. No land. The few excited birds which had been the only signs of life during the early part of my seemingly hopeless voyage had flown to the hills many miles distant. My condition was desolate I wore nothing but a pair of drawers and a shirt. Another dark, cheerless night. I heard some one blowing a fox-horn, away off on the hills. I shouted until my breath was gone. I became insensible and must have remained in that state for several days. For three weeks I drifted aimlessly——"

"How did you get anything to eat?" asked one of the party.

"That's a fact," replied the old man, "That's so. D—d if I haven't failed to put that provision in the bill. Wat'll you fellows take? Gimme a whisky sour."
