The confiding German thereupon produced his wealth, which amounted to $211, and handed it over. The two, relieved of the importunate monopoly representative, walked a few blocks when the stranger shook his Teutonic friend and disappeared for good.

The traveler returned to the depot and informed Wiley Dixon of the matter, becoming dimly conscious that he had been victimized.

On the arrival of No. 4 the German saw a man whom he was positive was the one who had robbed him, and the supposed villain was soon in the hands of the depot policeman, and as much astonished as he well could be.

Fortunately a newsboy, who came on the Linco n train, arrived at this opportune moment and identified the prisoner as a passenger who had come in on the Lincoln train, and who proved to be the traveling representative of a Des Moines crockery house This settled the question, and at last accounts the German was trying to reconcile himself to the fates by which he was out so large a sum.
