JOHN LINDT. ATTORNEY-AT-LAW. A Migration in India.

Chambers' Journal,
While in India, a few summers aget I observed that great multitudes of monkeys began to occupy the trees which grew along the margin of the Kurialli river. By degrees the interior of the forest became entirely deserted. Then for the first time I thing unusual was transpiring in the learned that annual migration took element they considered peculiarly place, owing to the lack of food in the their own, and the river suddenly be torest at this season of the year; for came alive with them. > It was probable that in by gone years the wily devotees had witnessed dozen such crossings; hence it seemed to me very likely that, by acurately observing certain signs and indications in the behavior of the monkeys, he was able to tell to a nicety the exact moment the creatures would enter the water. Using this little tes, but an ounce of it cost as knowlege for his own glorification, he much as a hundred pounds of the impretended to be gifted with preternatural powers, and I had but little doubt that the ignorant and superstitious natives who lived in the vicinity were thoroughly impressed with the idea that the migration took place under his immediate superintendence and at his express word of command. Next morning, just as the first streaks of dawn were reddening the sky, I was roused from my slumbers by a strident voice calling out,

Moreover, in the motions and gesticulations of these monkeys I could detect symptoms of an intense, though apparently sup-pressed, excitement. It was evident they were contemplating a step which they regarded as one of supreme moment to themselves. From the monkeys my gaze next wandered back to he mendicant. He was eyeing his children, as he called them, very intenty, and with a look full of eager expectation. Then my glance turned toward the river. A thin, light mist lay on the surface of the water, which being narrowest at this particular spot, was rather deep, and ran with a fair current.
