The Story of an Eye-Wi ness Who Saw the Bombardment From Admiral Nicholson's Flagship.

How the Magnificent City Was Reduced in a Few . Hours by British Gnus and Native Incendiaries.

Daniel Lyons, paymaster's yeoman the bombardment, has given to a World reporter an interesting account of the affair as seen from the American vessel. "We had returned to Lisbon from the coast of Barbary," said Lyons, "where the admiral received a telegram from the secretary of the navy to proceed to Alexandria. We were to have gone to the English channel, and this change of orders caused some an icipation on board, as we knew of the difficulties existing between the secretary of the officers and crews. The bombardment continued all day, and the eager watchers on board the Lancaster barely ullowed themselves time for marks in that themselves time for meals in their anxiety to miss none of the sport. The first question a man asked when he rushed up from the mess table was: For fifty years, from 1823 to 1873, 'Where did the last shot strike?'
