A premium Shanghai rooster, to him. tall enough to look in at the kitchen window, is the nearest approximation to an estrich that most of them ever to an estrich that most of them ever saw. But an estrich can do better than that. An estrich is the tallest bird in the world. There have been tailer birds than it in the world, but they have passed away, leaving the estrich the most altitudinous fewl in existence. A full-grown estrich can look in the second story window if it is not too high; indeed, a full-sized bird of this species can look in the garret window if allowed to stand on a platform raised half the distance.

Ostriches are not particularly prized for their flesh. Nor their eggs. A female ortrich will lay a great many eggs of a prodigious size—as large as a cocoanut; but ostrich eggs are not specially adaptable to omlet-making nor to egg-nog. What are ostriches raised for, then? it will be asked. Feathers. An ostrich feather is as superior in commercial value to the longest and grandest plumes of a Shanghai rooster as the ostrich is superior to the rooster in personal dimensions—length, breadth and thickness. A single one is worth $1 at wholesale, and a sin-McClure in the Philadelph's Times.

It is high time that the farmers of Missouri were turning their attention to raising ostriches. It has been too long overlooked.
