OLD TIME SLUGGERS.

How They Fought, Lived and Died,
 Interesting Reminiscences of Tom Hyer, Yankee Sullivan, John C. Heenan

And Other Pugilists Who Lived Before the Days of Sullivan and Knocking Out.

Chicago Herald.
 "Like everything else prize fighting is different now than what it was in my younger days. The system has entirely changed. The style of fighting has altered. Thirty years ago the aim of a pugilist in the ring was to inflict as much punishment as possible on his antagonist, and to stand an equal amount; or, if necessary, even more than he inflicted. His training made him able to do so. Fights were won then by endurance, usually. There was no 'knocking out' in half a dozen rounds. It was give and take for an hour or two, until the best man won. Nowadays, it seems to me, the science of boxing is to avoid punishment and to dispose of your opponent with a single blow.

The speaker might have been taken for a retired banker or a grave professional man. At the casual glance his venerable but hale countenance would not be associated with a love of sport and forty years' connection with it in every form. In the cozy corner of the down town resort, where every evening a little knot of men collected and listened eagerly as he went on in this strain:

"The men have changed also. The pugilist of day appears to me to be an altogether different being from his predecessor of thirty or forty years back. There's John L. Sullivan. Beyond a doubt he's a good man. He has the qualifications of an almost invincible fighter. Probably any man who attempted to beat him would find it a bad job. Ryan and Macos and Slade, and even the elder fighters, like Tom Allen and Joe Coburn, are all of them game men. They have plenty of muscle and pluck. But to pugilists like those beside Hyer and Yankee Sullivan, Heenan, Sayers and Ben Count—well, if the comparison is not exactly unfavorable to the contemporary millers, there is a decided difference in the parallel. The men of a generation ago were giants. They battled in a way that was simply terrific, and with results that no prize ring now sees."

"Who was the greatest of them?" asked The Herald reporter.

"That's difficult to say," answered the speaker. "They were all wonderful men. Tom Hyer and Yankee Sullivan flourished at about the same time. Heenan and Sayers came later. Tom Hyer was a fine man. He was of imposing stature and had a handsome face. Always dressed in the top of the fashion, his stately figure attracted all eyes when he moved through the streets. His father was a ringster and from him Tom derived much of his great strength and muscular development. The latter was marvelous. The layers of muscles around his shoulders and chest and the sinews of his arms were like ropes. While in training they were so hard and firm that you could scarcely indent his flesh without a considerable pressure. Between Tom and Yankee Sullivan a great rivalry existed. Yankee was a Troy boy, splendidly equipped by nature as a fighter."

"I was present at the match for $10,000 a side between these two in '40. It was the most celebrated battle that had ever occurred in America. The place originally fixed upon was Pooles Island in the Chesapeake, near Baltimore. When the schooner, having on board the principals and a hundred more of us, drew near the island, we found the authorities had got ahead of us. A company of the Baltimore light guards and a swarm of constables were drawn up at the landing. We put about and ran for a neck of woods called Stillpond Heights, in Kane county, Maryland. We came ashore and planted the stakes in a farm yard, whose owner, with all his man had gone to the island to see the mill. Probably the good farmer's wife, if she is yet living, remembers the devastation that the hungry crowd made of her hockeries. Well, the men were soon at it. It was the shortest fight on record up to that time. Eleven bloody rounds were fought in eleven and a half minutes. The hammering that each principal received was something terrible. I was a young fellow at my first fight. The sound of those mallet-like blows, and the sight of the marks they left was—well, it was sickening. In the eleventh round Hyer struck Sullivan an upward cut square in the chest. Yankee staggered back a dozen feet, then fell with a blister large as half a muskmelon, and the same color on his chest. That round settled the fight. I don't pretend to know how much money changed hands on the result. Popular opinion placed it as high as $1,000,000. I know a southern planter who bet fifty niggers against the same number on Hyer."

"Did Hyer ever fight Bill Pooles?"

"Yes, but not in the ring. Pooles was a rough and tumble only. He and Hyer had their grudge out one night on the wharf. It was the kind of an affair that two such gladiators would make when their passions were inflamed by hatred. They punched, bit and kicked, until when they were separated, they were mutilated objects. Pooles was a great character. He was a butcher, the pet of the Bowery, and was Hyer's only antagonist to supremacy among the fancy of New York. Bill was a politician and a very leader of the Know Nothings, whose slogan was 'America for the Americans.' He has an institution in Gotham, and, withal, a man of many admirable traits."

"What do you recall of John C. Heenan?" inquired one of the interested audience.

"The Beneca Boy," continued the veteran, lighting a fresh cigar, "set a mark on the history of his time. He was a remarkable man. To begin with, he was the perfection of manly beauty and vigor. His noble form was a realization of proportion, grace, agility and strength. Mentally he was far above his brother professional able feeling. Notwithstanding the continuation of his mysterious agony, he managed to attend to his duty, thinking that he would be rewarded with relief in a few days. Such was not the case, and the pain became more excruciating, and on Wednesday he discovered the sole cause of this ailment. He was taken suddenly ill, which required his absence from the car for a few moments, and upon elevating a hearty dinner which he had previously eaten, he beheld a marvelous curiosity in the way of a lizard or 'water-dog,' as it is sometimes termed, about three inches in length, which had evidently been guzzled into his stomach while drinking water. This is the only way its presence there can be accounted for, but how long it had been there or from whence it originated is more than can be comprehended, and the mystery remains a question for solution. Mr. Kelly is feeling much better, and if he sufficiently recovers as to resume his position, that he will endeavor to be more cautious when drinking water, or swallowing slimy lizards, cannot be denied.

One of the most recently established and successfully conducted of our benevolent societies is that of St. George. It is now in the first months of its second year. It is composed exclusively of Englishmen and their descendants, and now contains about 300 members. Its first appearance in the role of beneficiary will be at the opera house on Wednesday evening, the 25th inst. On that occasion the society will have the pleasure of presenting for the entertainment of its patrons the standard English melodrama, "Waiting for the Verdict." The piece is the work of Colin Hazlewood, a celebrated playwright of his time, and one of the most successful pieces of its kind. It is an excellent picture of life among the high and lowly in England, and having been written when the writing of melo-dramas was a science, it possesses touches of nature unknown to later productions. It will be presented with a good cast, comprising a number of ladies who have heretofore played in the piece in this city. The prices of admission will be 25, 50 and 75 cents.
