RECLAIMED BY BLOOD.

A Nevada Man Who Got What He Went for.

Haverstick's Mistress and Slayer in Omaha.

On the train yesterday, as it lay in the U. P. depot during the dinner hour, there were two passengers who were the objects of general attention and travelers and loungers about struggled to get a sight of them such as they would had it been General Grant, Jimbo, or some other noted personage.

The two distinguished persons upon whom so much attention was wasted were Geo. W. Conkling, Jr., of Reno, Nev., and his sister, Mrs. S. Clement Usher, whose names have been prominent before the public of late in connection with the shooting of Wm. H. Haverstick of New York.

Conkling went to New York in March at the request of his mother to reclaim his sister from a life of shame. She had been married to J. Clement Usher, a broker and had two children, but constant quarrels between the two resulted in her leaving her husband and going to live with Haverstick. The latter was not kind to her either, and when her brother arrived to take her away, refused to let her go. The two men came in contact in Haverstick's apartments, and Conkling shot his sister's paramour, who died soon after.

At the examination of Conkling, March 27, Justice Smith said that there was a reasonable ground for the belief that the defendant apprehended previous bodily harm when he fired the pistol; consequently he ordered the prisoner's discharge. The decision was scarcely announced when all the spectators arose to their feet and manifested their pleasure by loud cheers, clapping of hands and throwing of hats in the air. No attempt was made to subdue the uproarious applause, which was continued for several minutes, and until Conkling had received the congratulations of many friends and left the court. He repaired to his lawyer's office near by, where his sister, who had been unable to compare herself to the court room, had been taken, and, communicating the good news to her, an affecting scene transpired between the two. They embraced each other and cried with joy.

Conkling is now on his way back to Reno with the object he went after greater cost than he anticipated. In person the young fellow is not apparently over 35 years of age. He is a well built and very handsome young fellow, dressed neatly and looks anything but worried over his late trouble.

Mrs. Usher is about 32 years of age, short and rather stout. Her features are somewhat coarse and her complexion sallow and freckled. While she is not homely she is by no means pretty. She, like her brother, was dressed in excellent taste, her crimson plush suit being very becoming to her. Her trip out has doubtless removed the edge of the sorrow which she expressed over the death of Haverstick, and she ate her dinner at the depot dining hall with apparent relish.

APRIL WEATHER
Its Rapid Changes--Prophets of Evil, Etc.

April is a capricious month and one difficult to define. But it is a month singularly descriptive of Omaha. One may awake one morning to find a deep blue sky spanning above him and a pure, clear atmosphere refreshing and invigorating about him, just as one may find the streets of this city dry and smooth and the crossings passable. Again, one may awake to find the heavens clouded and a high gale blowing, just as the streets may be wretched and the dust blinding. Hot and cold spells alternate with impetuosity and provoke the pangs of acute rheumatism. This is a severe season also on people afflicted with pulmonary diseases, so it is difficult to preserve the rapid weather changes, which often occur several times a day. Still, we have been singularly free from contagion so far, unlike last year, when the smallpox threatened to invade Omaha for a long siege, and half the population was running shy of the other half, lest they should hurt their vaccinated arms. Some eastern doctors predict that the coming summer will be one of pestilence and plague. They base upon the theory that the cholera appears periodically each thirteen years, and should therefore be due this year, but doctors evidently don't know everything, and the wish is often father of the thought.

Moreover, people are not apt to be overcautious nowadays, after the experience with Mother Shipton and all the lesser prophets down to the Canadian as Wiggins. Is it not strange, that all these self-appointed prophets predict evil, hurricanes and death, plague and destruction, but not one ever put in a good word for poor humanity. We would like to hear some one predict some startling phenomenon of an agreeable nature, a shower of gold eagles, for instance. Instead of storms, etc., when people could crowd on the street in happy expectation and not dig themselves deep into the earth to escape a tornado or a cyclone. This is spring cleaning time, and the city authorities seem well aware of the fact, judging from the activity in street paving. Pavement to a city is what carrying is to a boat--it improves it, beautifies it, and insures greater cleanliness. We cannot have too much of it. This reminds us that the official head of the city has not been visible since the day of election, although he is said to be better and ready to be back in the sunshine and glory of the day.

Why suffer from a state of ill health? Why be troubled with dyspepsia? Brown's Iron Bitters will cure you.

AN OBSCURE LIBRETTO.

The Savage Indecencies With Which a Sovereign was Crowned.

Recent Honolulu papers contain some amusing articles in regard to the sequel of the coronation ceremonies of the Kanaka majesty, Kalakaua. It seems that in spite of Christianity this monarch has a fondness for many of the old heathen rites, and for none more than the hula, or national dances in praise of the attributes and powers of the sovereign. Long before the coronation Kalakaua had a select band of male and female dancers in training, and the hula were rehearsed with a vocal accompaniment in which Kalakaua was praised as a god. A libretto of the dances was published in Hawaiian, and was distributed among the guests on the afternoon of February 24, when the great dances were held in a huge tent on the palace grounds. The king and his court, all the high born but dusky ladies arrayed in brilliant colors and looking like a section of a dark camp meeting; all the distinguished foreign residents and visitors with their wives--these comprised the elite of the audience, the remainder being made up of a gang of unwashed Kanakas, who were very drunk and uproarious. The dances were given with great ceremony. They started out in stately fashion, but as the end of the programme was neared they became more and more lascivious, until finally many of the visitors were compelled to depart. Even young boys and girls were included among the dancers, and indulged in gestures and postures that would not be tolerated in the lowest dive or concert saloon in any American city. As an observer says: "In the most gross of the hulas were exhibited depths of nastiness such as language is not graphic enough to depict. Shame forbids one to describe, or even mention, the vile gestures, postures and actions of the men and women, and even boys and girls of what is usually regarded an innocent age." But the libretto exceeded the performance in puerility. It began with the titles of the early dances, describing the powers of Kalakaua over earth, air, and water, depicted in floral language; but soon there came descriptions of his physical prowess, who no one would have the hardihood to describe any more than they would give a detailed description of the mural paintings of the lamp and the ornaments in certain houses in Pompeii. There were simply the glorification of the pre-creative power in man, a revival of the old heathen worship, which even pagan Rome was compelled to suppress, as the worst source of moral debauchery. Kalakaua appeared to enjoy the performance hugely, and was totally unconscious of any offense to propriety. After the bawdy show was over, however, several of the ex-missionaries, who occupy seats in the court, represented to him that it would never do to acknowledge royal sanction of the libretto of the hula, although it bore the royal coat of arms. Accordingly a soap-sop was found who fathered the indecent programme, and both he and the proprietor of the Gazette, who printed them, were sued and fined $15 each for leasing the documents. This is a very thin device, but it probably acted as a salve to the conscience of the ministers. The hulas cost $1,000, and the entire ceremonies of the coronation cost no less than $29,000. As the cash in Kalakaua's treasury was only $35,000 at the time, there is a good prospect that he will be forced to imitate the khedive and borrow money on bonds.

Reviving Belligerent Times. Brook's Regis.

"This is great stuff, barkeep. Great stuff." He poured down another medium and looked around with a smile that showed a mouth like a grizzly bear's.

"Glad that you admire it," observed the bar-keeper, pouring out a modest dose for himself. "Might I ask to what part of the country it carries you back?"

"The first time that I tasted this brand, barkeep, was in Yreka, and I cleaned out that town on two slugs. That was a great day in Yreka. They hadn't a man in the county that could stand up to me for a second. That was the first, and when I got to feeling pretty good I swore I'd never get near it again. Barkeep, I killed four of the best friends I ever had that day, and the man in a coon-skin cap sighed dismally and eyed the bottle longingly.

"I seem to be doing pretty well for a man who has sworn off on the stuff," returned the barkeeper, pushing the bottle over rather reluctantly.

"The next whack I had at it, barkeep, was in Bismarck, M. T. That trip cost me shekels. Don't look at me in that way, barkeep. Don't do it. They rushed me in; and it put me to an expense of thirty bags of dust to get away. Don't stare that way, barkeep; it revives the feelings of that occasion."

"Look here!" exclaimed the barkeeper, "You ain't going to tackle it again with all that experience?"

"When I got started on that brand, barkeep, there ain't nothing in the states to stop me! Nevada City was the next place in which that whiskey stared me in the face. Nevada City has never been the same place since! There has never been the capital in there since to rebuild the town."

"Was that the last place?" asked the man in the coon-skin cap.

"Until I come here," replied the man in the coon-skin cap, impressively. "And, barkeep, I'm going to put you in the way of making a lot of money. In twenty minutes there's going to be a lot of unimproved property for sale in this town. I feel it coming on! I recognize the sensations! Don't try to hold me, barkeep! Don't pay any attention to me! My feelings are very friendly toward you now, but a wink may change in a minute. The drums are beginning to work! You can't tell when murder may take the place of my affection! and he started for the door with a terrible expression of wrath on his face.

"If you don't pay for them drinks I'll stab the head off you where you stand!" and the barkeeper brought out his weapon and placed himself between the stranger and the door.

"Am I mistaken in the brand?" asked the man in the coon-skin cap, turning a little pale. "Do I hesitate to kill this man because I have lost my taste in your own interest, barkeep, say it was the Yreka brand! Say it was the same I got in Bismarck! Admire it! It was the stuff that leveled Bismarck! Don't deceive me, barkeep! Don't let me die with the idea that Albuquerque and Nevada City perished in vain!"

"Money or bust!" roared the exasperated bar-keeper. "Pay, or down you go!"

"I'll pay, barkeep!" replied the man in the coon-skin cap, meekly. "I haven't any money with me, but I'll drop in and settle this thing with you. Do you think I'd go back on a man that has not only saved his own life, but has redeemed me just as I was going to pull down another town? I'm above it!" and the man in the coon-skin cap dodged the club and reached the door.

"Strange that I made that mistake in that brand of whiskey," he murmured, as he made off up the street. "I must have got the whiskey right and made a mistake in the bar-keep."
