frantically to the distant boatmen. slumber, and rubbing their eyes, take their places at the poles of the windlass. The sleepy horse, too, is roused to animation by a lusty thump on the ers. A half hour suffices to pay out all the colled-up meshes and connect the further end by a fresh rope with another windlass a quarter of a mile from where the first wheel is turning. The net with its land ropes now includes a vast semicircle of water. Standing at the centre one cannot see, at far is it, the line of floats at the outer line. The hauling at both ence is done slowly, for the strain is enormous, and when the rope has brought in the net to shore the windless has to be dispensed with, as the meshes would be torn on the machinery. Now follows the most curious speciacle of all. The negroes, protected by rubbers reaching far up on their thighs, dash into the water. Each has a shoulder sash made from a thick strip of netting ending at the walst in a slip noose of cord, which by means of a peg is quickly passed over the float rope of the net and fastened. Taeu, bending their shoulders shoreward, they walk up the strand, dragging the net, each in turn loosing his knot to take his place once more at the river end of the human line. It is a long and morotonous pull, lasting for an nour, that follows, but the picturerque figures of the negroes, their occasional shouts or songs, the gathered crowds on the bank, and the strange forms of snag, or stone, or weed, that the net brings in, make constant interest and excitement. Sometimes it is a pioneer fish that breaks the surface, or a huge tree-bough from the muddy Delaware bottom, or an eel, which, in advance of its fellows, has been caught in the coils and is brought in squirming to its fate. When one sees, however, the immense toll and power needed to handle one of these colossal seines, much of the poetry of fishing is marred by the expense. Not counting equipment or horses, some forty or fitty men are needed in the various processes of paying, coiling, and dragging the seine An ordinary negro hand here rated. As the semi-circle of floats narrow its dimensions, and with lessened resistance the net comes in faster and isster, the excitement deepens. The meshes now are clogged with the shells of fresh water clams, which two email boys armed with sticks strike water. To keep the lower edge of swindled you out of $18 the not close to the bottom and prevent the escape of the fish a stalwart negro at either side tramping down the sinker rope on the sand. Now comes the climax. The other huge shad dashes almost out of water up the bank, turns his gleaming side, and darts again back into the restraining net. Catfish, eels and clammy suckers break water, and a nimble perch leaps through the air like a flying fish. Vain the struggle for existence.

corps about $22 a month and board,

The remorseless net, relentless as fate, closes in. A few pulls more and the sinker rope is on shore, and the prey are bauged in a meshy basin fifty feet wide. A moment later and a circle of men have "hived" the fish in a foamy, fluttering mass that churns the muddy water into spray. A boat is run alonside, astrong scoop net transfers the shad, mixed with alewives, herring, perch, catfish and suckers, to the craft's bottom, and the haul is ended. Sometimes, particularly if the season is early, the draw will be a "blank," and not a shad will come in to reward all this two hours' trouble. But it is a rare thing not to get at least a hundred, and one or two years ago 2,500 shad and 60,000 alewives were drawn at one haul. When first caught the Dalaware shad is an object of rare beauty. Fat, rotund, with rich, dark green trout, bass and other "game" fish, but contents himself with an occasional dull thump of protest with his muscular tail. except on Sandays.

who, having become possessed of the map of the region where the bandits' treasures were buried, is now in search of them. Mrs. Joaquin Murietta inclines to the opinion, however, that the burial place of the bandits' treasures was known only to Joaquin, and that he took the secret with him to the grave. For twenty years she has sought for it, but without success.
