CREIGHTON COLLEGE.

Interesting Commencement Exercises Being the Fifth Anniversary of this Kind.

A more beautiful night could not have been desired for commencement exercises. It was pleasant and cool, and the firmament was as clear as the firmament of Nebraska always is when the storm clouds and angry winds have made up their minds to take a rest. As a consequence, the attendance at Creighton college commencement Wednesday night filled to excess the capacious hall of the institution. And the gaily and richly attired assembly showed beyond the peradventure of a doubt that it did not anticipate the sudden bursting of another of those summer storms which, of late, have made light and summer toilets a hollow mockery.

Five years have elapsed since the opening of this educational institution. There have been in that time, in the public exercises of the college, satisfactory evidence that the cherished object of the institution and the intention of the founders was being most happily realized. The elocutionary features and the thought in essays displayed in the original essays of the students have been of an extraordinary high order. So much so indeed as not only to redound to the credit of the faculty and students but also to convey a more than secret satisfaction to the friends of the institution.

Last evening there was still another and equally conclusive proof that the excellent intention in being studiously maintained. It is true that the features of the programme last night were in the main rather lighter than usual, that is, there were fewer essays than formerly, there being but one in the list. And while that one was in every way creditable, it was the only one, because, it is learned, accidents had appeared to prevent the reading of two more, which would have given the thinking mind of the youths its full representation in the programme. The two young gentlemen who had been in preparation for their appearance had written most beautiful compositions, but were prevented from appearing by unfortunate physical injuries, which kept them from class work until almost the last day of the season.

The programme opened with an overture from Boettger, most excellently rendered by the Musical Union orchestra. This organization was in large number and rendered some delightful music at intervals during the evening. Their every piece evoked hearty demonstrations of appreciation from the audience. The College Glee Club, numbering seven boys, under the direction of Father Miles, sang that air familiar to every college boy, "Uppidee," with excellent taste, appreciation and effect. Later in the evening, they sang a vacation song, and also "Good Night," the latter a paraphrasing of Abt's beautiful piece. The last number was a number of most tender and entertainingly rendered, especially in the piano passages, and the more without accompaniment, and the more to the credit of the vocalists, because it showed not alone the skill of the instructor, but also the correctness of ear and the ability of the singers.

Master Frank McCrackin, one of the most interesting and successful students in the college, read Longfellow's "Monk Felix" in excellent style, as did also Master James Ruah, Gerald Griffin's beautiful poem on the "Sister of Charity." The first mentioned little fellow was trained by Mr. Owens and the latter by Mr. Garland.

Master Frank McGinn sang "Shells of the Ocean" sweetly. The evening was Master Peter Sherlock, a young gentleman from South Pass, Wyoming. He is a young man who, in two years, has made three classes, and borne off prizes and honors so numerous as to delight his parents in their mountain home. His essay was entitled "A Fading Past." The speaker compared the literature of the present with that of the ancient times. He deprecated the decrease of learning, and asked where were the men-to-day who could compare with the philosophers and poets of the Grecian isles. He held that the facilities for education were abundant to-day, but the colleges had to go begging for patronage. The world now could not compare in intelligence to Great Britain in the Elizabethan period, or even in the days of those intellectual giants—Webster, Clay and Calhoun. The speaker made an eloquent appeal for education through college training. Mr. Sherlock's delivery was forcible and made a fine effect. As an original production the oration was very able, full of thought and well constructed. Mr. Sherlock is a bright young man, and his future is full of promise. He was in the immediate direction of Mr. J. F. Bergin, S. J.

The closing feature of the literary part of the programme was the comedy "Making the Dialogue." Dialogues have always figured in those exercises, and with so much success as to arouse considerable desire among the students of the college to be selected to take part. Only the most enthusiastic and most capable speakers are honored by being assigned to parts, hence the uniform success which has attended the presentation of the little comedies.

The plot of the piece consisted in the secret meeting of a number of undegraded orators, burning with a desire to electrify an audience. They meet to devise some means "getting on" the dialogue and suggest all kinds of subjects which they would like to introduce into the piece, and upon which they would like to expatiate to the delight of their friends and admirers. One of them would like to speak upon "asphaltum pavements," another on "the duke," a third on "fairies," a fourth on "the abolition of holidays and vacation," a fifth on the "Jefferson Square market house," a sixth on a telephone which he wanted to patent and so on ad infinitum. The catalogue is, of course, too democratic, and the objections so multiform and various, that it is impossible for the youngest to agree upon any definite plan to suggest to the professor. As a consequence there is at times a confusion of tongues of the kind which it is supposed to have prevailed at Babel some time ago, a confusion not the least interesting because of being boyish and original. Incidental to the meeting is the recitation of a piece by each of the deliberators, which is performed as follows:

Master John E. Simpson spoke "The Old Lady's Lament;" Master John B. Furry, "Two Mischiefs;" Master Chas. B. Gibbon, "The World Would Be Better for It;" Master John St. Clair, "The Boy Who Never Told a Lie;" Master Jas. T. Flannigan, "The Asphalt Roller;" Master W. A. Flannigan, "The Bells of Shandon;" Master Martin Mc-

GATH, "Liberty or Death."

Every one of these pieces brought forth most heartily applause. They were all excellently rendered, and were among their subjects, alternating from grave to gay, that when the people were not in smiling and laughing mood, it was because they were wrapped in appreciation of what conduced to more sober thought. The dialogue introduced an incredible amount of local hits most interesting and amusing, and kept the audience in excellent humor throughout.

The piece was produced with considerable stage business, the little fellows not only speaking but also acting with intelligence and ability. It is no derogation to the other little gentlemen to specify the reading of the Father Prout's "Bells of Shandon," by William Flannigan. It was a wonderful specimen of elocution in one so young, and its repetition was requested by certain parties of the audience, but the request was considerably declined because of a desire to not fatigue the little fellow, who had not only spoken, but also sung during the evening. The dialogue closed with a grand reading in concert by all the participants of Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade." The harmony, the precision, the varying tones, the gestures of the boys in the piece, was universally commended.

The dialogue was the work of Mr. Edward A. O'Brien, and the training of the participants was due to him. The beautiful hall was most finely and appropriately decorated for the occasion. On the front of the stage was erected a labyrinth of framework forming a sort of proscenium, painted white and relieved with gold. Each side was surmounted with a crucifix, and immediately under the left crucifix was a splendid portrait in oil of the late Edward Creighton, the founder of the college, and under the one on the right a like portrait of his wife, Mrs. Mary L. Creighton. Just under the arch appeared in large capitals the letters "A. M. D. G."—Ad Majorem Dei Gloriam—The Greater Glory of God, which is the motto of the society of Jesuits. Under this was the simple word "Victory" in gilt letters. All this was set off with flags and festooning, the whole presenting a most pleasing appearance.

The exercises closed with the distribution of prizes, which were awarded to heads of classes by the Right Rev. Bishop O'Connor, as follows: The Creighton prize for best catechetical essay, was won by John A. McCreary. The McCreezy prize for proficiency in Latin, was won by Robt. E. MacDonagh. The Dellone prize for best English description, was won by John Toner. The Furry prize for reading, was won by Wm. A. Flannigan. The McShane prize for book-keeping, was won by Peter R. Sherlock. The Creighton prize for progress in penmanship, was won by John H. O'Neill.

The Red Flag. OMAHA, JUNE 26, 1883. Editor of THE BEE. I noticed in THE BEE an article entitled "The Red Flag," in which it is related that a person desiring to auction off goods put out a red flag, thereby frightening the public into a belief that the small pox was once more playing and have in our midst.

Since coming to this promising city I have frequently wondered why a red flag is used as a signal of contagious diseases, while in at least most of the cities a yellow flag is used for that purpose. In the army a yellow flag means sickness and even the enemy respects it by keeping away. In such small cities as New York, Chicago and St. Louis, a red flag is an invitation to come in and buy. Now, why in this growing metropolis, where strangers are to be met on every hand, should they be invited to walk into a pest house, while citizens are driven away from opportunities to buy cheap? Can't you attach your book and line and jerk this unusual practice into the middle of the Big Muddy thereby insuring the lives of our visitors, and making our auctions to bloom with larger returns? Truly yours, HAZELTON.

The Bright Bevy of Girl Graduates from the High School.

Entertaining Essays at the Opera House Last Evening.

The tenth annual commencement of the Omaha High School occurred last evening at the opera house, and before the exercises were half through the large audience was convinced that the class of '83 was one of the most graceful and intelligent that has yet come from our public schools. The lately organized brass band of the Omaha Musical Union gave several selections, playing for the first time publicly, we believe. This was supplemented by some very excellent chorus singing by the ninety scholars of the high school room seated on the stage and led by Miss Lucia Rogers, Miss House being at the piano.

The programme opened with a march, "The Golden Chain," a piano duet by Misses Withnell and House. Miss Lizzie J. Fenwick was the first essayist, her subject being "Science and Superstition," in which she showed how the infinite superiority of natural phenomena had led to the peculiar superstitions of many early peoples. Science, ever on the alert to correct superstitious ideas, has swept away all this. The whirlpool is no longer to us a monster, nor the rainbow a dragon. Superstition has furnished material to the poet, and has served all religions, but the light of the nineteenth century is too strong for it. Miss Edith E. Phelps gave a very practical discussion of "Home Culture." The preparation for the battle of life is made at home under the mother's influence, and there whatever talent the child displays should meet its first encouragement.

Miss Hulda F. Isaacson spoke upon "Nature and Art," tracing the growth of the fine arts and arguing that the artist must needs be a good and true man to hear that voice in nature which speaks to him only. The "Pilgrim Chorus," from Wagner, was rendered by the school and then a diverting allegory was given by Miss Ida L. Remington, in which her class was pictured as "In Open Sea" in the good bark "H. S.," which had been cruising amidst the islands of philosophy and science and letters. She turned a neat compliment to their late and their new principal. The class recitation was then given by the seven young lady graduates, Poe's "Bells," in which they had been faithfully drilled by Miss Hardenburgh. By a beautiful coincidence there was just the full octave of seven voices to make a melodious chime. When they reached that reference to "the loud alarm bell," the fire-bell struck in harmoniously for nine o'clock. We are tempted to quote the parody.

Hear the laughter of the girls, And the intinnatulation that unceasing, ever purrs, From the girls, girls, girls, girls, Girls, girls, girls, From the wild, capricious, saucy, jaunty girls, Miss Louisa J. Bruce, the third colored graduate from the high school, chose for her theme, "Time for Intellectual and Moral Culture," pleading that our education must commence with the earliest possible period. More music followed, "Evening Bells," the evening seemed to run to bells—and belles; and the encore to the class recitation brought forth "The Bells of Enderby." "Conversation as an Art," was the title of Miss Alice M. Hartman's delightful essay. She desired to see more attention paid to conversation, which, as an art, is nowadays much neglected. Her criticism of the various modern styles of conversation was very keen. Lizzie H. Leisenring disputed the British proverb that everything which is American is vulgar, in her thesis on "Americanisms." She showed how useful is our slang, and by contrast, that as far as vulgarity is concerned the British are no better.

The school song, "Waken Lords and Ladies Gay," and the diplomas were then presented to the class by E. K. Long in a short address, which we are sorry we cannot give. The diplomas are elegantly engraved on parchment. The floral tributes to the graduates were made in the greatest profusion. Seven pretty little girls, seven shadows of the graduates, bore the bouquets from the left hand box to the stage.

Track Notes. Trains came in on the main line yesterday, and from Nebraska City on the Nebraska railway. These trains will run on time to-day. No train went out yesterday on the A. & N., and none will go out to Tecumseh to-day as was anticipated, though one will probably run as far as Sterling.

The mail from Tecumseh was brought up overland yesterday, and will be taken back the same way to-day. The driver informed a reporter that he would make it through in one day—a distance of nearly fifty miles.

Supt. J. McConiff returned to town yesterday from an arduous trip down the A. & N. He has obtained a personal knowledge of the exact condition of his line, and will push the work of repair as rapidly as it can be done. There is an immense amount of repair necessary, and it is not likely that it will be entirely completed in two weeks. It is not probable that such a wreck will ever occur again in the history of the road.—State Journal.

FELO DE SE. An Unknown Man Attempts to Climb the Golden Stair by the Strychnine.

About 10 o'clock last evening as Officer Pat Hinchey was tramping his weary beat he was accosted by an excited young man, who said a man had just gone down Farnam street on a St. Mary's avenue car who appeared to be suffering from something he could not explain, and asked Hinchey's help. When the car returned from the depot Hinchey met it and found a man stretched out apparently in the last stages of existence. He unloaded the inanimate object at Fifteenth street and carried him to the city jail, where Dr. Leisenring was summoned by telephone. The Dr. arrived and pronounced it a case of poisoning, and administered emetics, which, in a few minutes, operated, and in a short time the patient was able to talk.

He said he was married day before yesterday to Miss Emma Hosser, of Plattsmouth, daughter of W. J. Hosser, the florist. They came to Omaha and stopped at the Metropolitan, where they passed one day of unalloyed domestic bliss, but the second day the green-eyed monster intruded and destroyed the temple. The husband, Mr. K. C. Van Cleaves, betook himself to the shady rocks of Hanscom park, and imbibed the destructive decoction called strychnine, and as is stated above, was discovered by officer Hinchey. He was visited at the jail last evening by a BEB reporter. He had not fully recovered and was not able to converse rationally, but stated that his wife was still at the Metropolitan, and that they had been followed by some fiend in human shape who was seeking to destroy his domestic happiness. Faithful inquiries failed to develop anything that would warrant THE BEB in such an assertion. The Metropolitan was visited and the alleged bride failed to materialize. The clerk said she had departed before noon, and her whereabouts was unknown.

Van Cleaves was discharged this morning by the authorities, who of course held him only for his own safety, and appeared to be entirely recovered, promising not to repeat the attempt on his own life. He went back to the Metropolitan, where his wife really had been all the time. The poor lady was worried to death about her husband, knowing nothing of his whereabouts or trouble until this morning.

Van Cleaves had written a letter to his wife, which was subsequently found in his pocket, in which he stated that he was going to commit suicide. A man who is well acquainted with all the parties thinks the mysterious individual who shadowed Van Cleaves intended to kill both husband and wife had he run across them, and says Van Cleaves would be justified in shooting him down in his tracks the first time he meets him.
